

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

WE think it necessary to lay before our readers the reasons and purposes for which this journal has been established, and to give an outline of the matter and subjects which it is intended its columns shall contain. It may be, that we shall not offer a bill of fare which may tempt the imagination, or stimulate the passions; but we hope to present one that will be substantial, without being heavy, and of solid usefulness, not only to the legal profession, but also to the country gentleman, and every person connected with the administration of justice, or interested in the improvement and transfer of property—subjects which the recent and contemplated changes in the law render of paramount importance.

There is no journal in Ireland exclusively devoted to law reports, and law intelligence, and it cannot be doubted that there ought to be such a journal, and that the professional Irish law world should not be without a recognised organ, and medium to convey its sentiments, communicate intelligence, and discuss calmly and temperately changes in the law, whether accomplished or intended, and which affect not only the interests of the profession, but the whole fabric of society.

The necessity for such a law newspaper, which has always existed, has never, perhaps, been greater than at present; for it must be conceded that a revolution in the laws relating to real property in Ireland is rapidly taking place. The effect of this on the well-being of the country, cannot be estimated, but unquestionably each step should be canvassed, weighed, and matured, before it be taken; there are nulla vestigia retrorsum. It is not presumption to suppose that by no class should every change connected with the jurisprudence of the country be discussed with more practical benefit, than by legal men—their trained habits of thought, and familiarity with the subject pre-eminently fit them for the task; but yet hitherto there has been no established medium for the interchange of legal ideas!

If illustration were required to prove the utility of possessing such a medium, it is presented in the instance of the Irish Law Society. That very useful body, which has frequently interfered with success to prevent or postpone the passing of either mischievous or crude legislation, publish annually a condensed summary of the measures of the preceding year which they have opposed or procured, disapproved or promoted; but though this epitome be ably compiled, it labours under the disadvantage of being too compressed, and being a single publication, it not only wants the force of frequent repetition to produce effect, but also the power of discussing each separate matter, as the necessity arises; and dealing with the past or the future does not act upon the present with sufficient force.

It is unjust to suppose that lawyers are opposed to amendments in the law; but their knowledge of the subject, and of mankind, render them peculiarly alive to the difficulty of altering laws under which rights and complicated relations have been created, and whilst they are willing and anxious that well considered improvements should be introduced, they wish to see them the result of that skill and caution their importance demands. Can it be denied that the temperate discussion by lawyers of law reform, would be conducive to the public good? Every important change, if based on sound principles, can with advantage be tested, probed, and examined. The interest of the lawyer and the legislator are not in antagonism.

But the utility of such a publication as the JURIST, is not confined to the discussion merely of contemplated acts of Parliament; it becomes more practically useful when those measures are being carried into actual operation, for then it is the intelligencer of the mode in which they are worked, it conveys with speed and authenticity the decisions made on them, and can indicate the consequences which they are likely to produce, and their practical bearing and effect.

We may take—as examples of the advantages to be derived, with reference to past and future legislation, from our journal—the Poor Law acts, and the act for the Sale of Incumbered Estates. The former will be entirely reconsidered in the next session of Parliament, and it can hardly be denied that a preliminary and careful discussion of the whole question connected with the compulsory relief of the poor, will be of great practical utility. We invite this discussion.

Rapid and careful reports of the decisions pronounced on the Incumbered Estates Act, and frequent statements of the practical working of the measure, must, we should think, be important, not only to the practitioner, but to half the landed proprietors of Ireland, whose interests are so wound up in the measure.

For these reasons, if there were none other, the advantages of a journal in which present and future laws can be weighed and considered, are apparent, and these advantages are not limited, but universal; equally beneficial to the lawyer, the country-gentleman, and the senator. The latter, in the progress of a measure through either House of Parliament, will have his attention directed to defects or omissions, and those niceties of detail which only strike the legal mind. Hence may be avoided “Acts to amend Acts,” and laws rudely shaped, which yet deeply affect some of the most important interests in the community.

We do not seek to set an undue value on the ability with which this journal may be conducted; our judgment may be wrong, but still we shall be useful, we are established, we are ready to hear the opinions, to receive the advice of others, and we shall form a nucleus, round which may be collected the opinions of men of capacity and intelligence.

We promise to be influenced by neither personal nor sordid motives; if we know ourselves and the spirit with which we have undertaken this journal, our single aim is, to conduct it with an earnest desire for truth, impartiality and justice.

We do not, however, mean to fill our columns solely with dissertations; the greater portion of our space will be occupied with concise Reports of cases which involve questions of law or of general interest. Thus, without interfering with the regular reports, it is our object to give information equally authentic, and with more rapidity.

It is both impolitic and dishonest to be liberal in promise and meagre in performance, but we may state, that it is our design to insert not merely cases which occur in this country, but also questions of law or interest which are taking place in others; variety of food, provided it be wholesome, is as agreeable to the intellect as to the body. We shall give Reviews of law works, and Biographies of eminent legal men, and Reports in full of interesting public trials, enlarging our space according to the press of matter, and the support with which we meet.

It is our purpose to omit no source of information, consistently with our limits, which will be useful to the working practitioner of both professions, he will have the decisions of the judges almost as soon as pronounced, and will thus be at once apprized of every new principle and every modification in practice.

Every important Act of Parliament will be analyzed, and a careful Annual Index compiled, not merely of the cases reported in this periodical, but of those which have been reported within that time in Ireland. That portion devoted to Law Lists and Tables will be compiled with the most pains-taking accuracy.

The questions and principles of law and practice to which this journal will be devoted, must necessarily be useful to every landed proprietor and magistrate—the laws which affect the one, and those which are to be administered by the other, will be frequently the subject of practical exposition.

If we fulfil our part, the experiment will be tested, whether the Irish public will lend its support to a journal which professes to give useful information, apart from the struggles of party and the excitement of politics.

THE act for the sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland forms a very important chapter in the history of the law of real property. We shall endeavour, in this article, to lay before our readers a general statement of the changes which this statute has introduced into the law. We neither seek to exaggerate nor underrate their magnitude, and our comments will be written in no unfriendly spirit.

The bill, as introduced by Lord Cottenham into the House of Lords, contained no provision for the sale of lands without the order of the Court of Chancery—these were added to the measure during its progress through the House of Commons. Their dovetailing has marred the symmetry of the act, and we venture to predict this portion of it will be practically inoperative. The owner of an estate for life being invested with the power of selling the inheritance, it was necessary to provide stringent guarantees for the safety of incumbrancers and remainder-men—those which have been provided by the statute will occasion such loss of time, and such publicity, that no owner will be likely to resort to them, and a purchaser will prefer a sale by order of the Court, in which case his title will not be kept in abeyance for five years.

The operations of the act will also be more limited than is generally supposed, as will be apparent from the fact that the owner, the first incumbrancer, and the incumbrancer having possession of the title-deeds, can alone proceed for a sale under the order of the court; a puisne incumbrancer cannot, except he is prepared to apply to the court for liberty to redeem the prior incumbrances, and—in case the amount of such prior incumbrances is unascertained—is ready to pay into court the amount claimed, to abide the result of the taking of an account, whilst he is precluded from questioning the validity or title of such prior incumbrances. Sec. 70. This will operate as a practical exclusion to all puisne incumbrancers proceeding under the order of the court; they will—and they form the vast majority of plaintiffs in courts of equity—consequently be obliged to resort to the present system of filing foreclosure bills.

We now proceed to mention the principal alterations and novelties introduced by the statute.

1st. It allows an owner to initiate proceedings for a sale of his estate, for the payment of incumbrances affecting the inheritance; and an owner, as defined by the 1st section, includes every person from the tenant in fee, to the tenant by the courtesy, and in the case of leaseholds, from the person entitled in perpetuity, to the possessor of an unexpired term of fifty years, not being an under-lessee at a rent.

2ndly. It confers a parliamentary title on a purchaser; in the case of sales under the direction of the Court of Chancery, as soon as the conveyance is executed, and in the case of sales without the order of the court, within five years from the conveyance.

3rdly. In case of sales under the order of the court, the Master in Chancery has the power of apportioning head rent amongst the lots into which the land may be distributed for sale or reservation; but this power does not exist in cases where the sale is without the order of the court.

7thly. The Master in Chancery is the only necessary party to a conveyance to a purchaser, thus dispensing with conveyances from all persons having the legal estate.

8thly. It enables persons entitled to unredeemable charges, such as jointures and annuities, to accept a gross sum by way of compensation, and enables the Master in Chancery to sell the lands discharged of those charges, and include the compensation in his report.

9thly. The obvious design of the act is to transfer litigation from the land to the purchase-money, which is to be lodged to the credit of the accountant-general.

Such are some of the most prominent features of the measure which we shall from time to time canvass in detail.

The distinguishing characteristic of the act may be said to be, that it confers power on the owner of an incumbered estate to initiate proceedings to get rid of the incumbrances affecting the inheritance by a sale of so much of the security upon which they were charged, as will be sufficient for their liquidation, and to render the residue available for himself and his family. In fact the term owner in such cases was a mockery, he was in reality more often the agent of his creditors. He could not have effected his purpose by a judicial sale, inasmuch as our courts of equity did not recognise the right of any person other than an incumbrancer, to put its jurisdiction in motion for such a purpose. Neither could he have disposed of it by private contract, inasmuch as the law required the consent of every creditor, whose debt was registered a matter of record, to be evidenced by his executing the conveyance to the purchaser, or releasing the lands, as a condition precedent to the validity of the sale—a requirement, which, although intended as a protection to the creditor (whose interests would otherwise, in the absence of any controlling power as to the rate of purchase or mode of disposition, have been completely at the mercy of the owner) was, from its very nature, an absolute prohibition against alienation by a proprietor. In this dilemma—debarred upon the one hand, from all participation in the privileges of a suitor to the equitable tribunals of the country, and practically shut out, upon the other, from the right of disposition by private contract, with which, as we have seen, he was but *nominal*ly invested—the owner of an incumbered estate, desirous to sell, had no other alternative left him, by which to bring his estate into the market than to solicit the co-operation of a “friendly creditor,” and to procure the institution in his name of what was well known by the title of “an amicable suit,” the object of which was to obtain thus indirectly the intervention of a court of Equity.

But here again the owner was not unfrequently destined to find himself disappointed, inasmuch as the circuitous expedient of an amicable suit, as a means of converting the lands charged with incumbrances into a fund for their liquidation, was dependent for its success, not merely upon the disposition of the friendly incumbrancer, but upon the priority of his demand, or his ability to redeem the prior incumbrances, which it was necessary, in the first instance, to offer to redeem, otherwise his bill was not in strictness maintainable, so that even the co-operation of a creditor was far from being a certain resource upon which the owner could fall back in his extremity.

This disability, on the part of an owner to sell his estate for the legitimate purpose of paying the incumbrances affecting it, has been removed for the first time, in the history of our Jurisprudence. Proprietors of incumbered properties are, at last, regarded as practically competent to sell them, without the assent of their creditors, and this they are empowered to do in two ways, either by private contract, or through the medium of a judicial sale, under the direction of the court of Chancery.

In our next number we will examine the different modes of proceeding under the act, and contrast their relative advantages.

GENERAL ORDERS FOR THE OFFICES OF THE TAXING MASTERS OF THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

Dated the 9th day of October, 1848.

1. That the offices of John O'Dwyer, Esq., and Edward Tandy, Esq., two of the said Taxing Masters, shall, until further ordered, be held at No. 20, Upper Ormond Quay, in the city of Dublin; and the office of the third Taxing Master, to be appointed under the said Act, shall be in such place as the Lord Chancellor shall direct.

2. That the several orders of the 26th day of October, 1845, relating to the office of Taxing Master, the times and hours of attendance thereat, the duties of the Taxing Master, his powers, and the course of proceeding in his office, shall in all respects apply to and govern the several Taxing Masters appointed and to be appointed under the said Act of the last session, and their respective offices, and the clerks therein.

3. That all Bills of Costs now standing by the said General Orders of the 26th day of October, 1845, or by any decree or order, referred to the said John O'Dwyer, Esq., as the Taxing Master of the court, and on which he has not certified the costs due, are hereby referred as well to the said John O'Dwyer as to the other Taxing Masters appointed and to be appointed under the said Act, who shall regulate among themselves the distribution thereof for taxation, so as to avoid any unnecessary delay to the solicitors and suitors of the court; and, to that end, each of said Masters shall be at liberty to adopt the whole, or such part as he shall think fit, of the proceedings which have already taken place in respect to the taxation of any of said bills; and the certificate of any other of the said Taxing Masters, of the sum due on such bills, shall be of the same force as that of the said John O'Dwyer, notwithstanding any reference of such costs to him by name.

4. That the said Taxing Masters shall arrange a plan for determining the future references of all costs under the decrees, or orders of the court, or under requisitions to each of them, in weekly rotation; such plan to be submitted to and approved of by the Lord Chancellor.

5. That when there shall have been any former taxation of costs in the same cause or matter, all references therein for the taxation of costs shall be made to the Taxing Master before whom such former taxation has taken place, either on a reference from the court, or upon the request of a Master in Ordinary; but any taxation had before the said John O'Dwyer, Esq. before this date, shall not be deemed a former taxation within this rule, so as necessarily to require that all future references for taxation in the same cause or matter should be made to him.

6. That the Taxing Masters shall be respectively assistant to each other; and that in the discharge of their duties, and for the better despatch of the business of their respective offices, any Taxing Master may tax, or assist in the taxation of a bill of costs which has been referred for taxation to any other Taxing Master, and in such case may certify sum due in respect thereof.

GENERAL ORDERS IN CHANCERY.

Pursuant to the provisions of the 11th & 12th Vic. c. 68.
"An Act for better securing Trust funds, and for the relief of Trustees."

Dated the 9th day of October, 1848.

1. Any trustee desiring to pay money, or transfer stock or securities into the name of the Accountant-General of the court of Chancery, under the said Act, is to file an affidavit, entitled in the matter of the act and of the trust, and setting forth:—

(1.) His own name and address.

(2.) The place where he is to be served with any petition, or any notice of any proceeding or order of the court relating to the trust fund.

(3.) The amount of stock, securities, or money which he proposes to deposit, or to transfer, or to pay into court, to the credit of the trust.

(4.) A short description of the trust, and of the instrument creating it.

(5.) The names of the parties interested in or entitled to the fund, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the trustee.

(6.) The submission of the trustee to answer all such enquiries relating to the application of the stocks, securities, or money transferred, deposited, or paid in, under the Act, as the Court may think proper to direct.

2. The party filing such affidavit on production of an attested copy thereof, is to be at liberty to enter a side bar rule to lodge or invest the money, stock, or security specified in such affidavit, in the Bank of Ireland, with the privacy of the Accountant-General, to the account of the particular trust.

3. The Accountant-General, on production of an office copy of the affidavit and rule, is to give the necessary directions for transfer, deposit, or payment, and to place the stock, securities, or money, to the account of the particular trust; and such transfer, deposit, or payment is to be certified in the usual manner.

4. The trustee having made the payment, transfer, or deposit, is forthwith to give notice thereof to the several persons named in his affidavit, as interested in, or entitled to the fund.

5. Such persons, or any of them, or the trustee, may apply by petition, as occasion may require, respecting the investment, payment out, or distribution of the fund, or of the dividends or interest thereof.

6. The trustee is to be served with notice of any application made to the Court respecting the fund, or the dividends or interest thereof, by any party interested therein, or entitled thereto.

7. The parties interested in, or entitled to the fund, are to be served with notice of any application made to the Court by the trustee, respecting the fund in Court, or the interest or dividends thereof.

8. No petition is to be set down to be heard, until the petitioner has first named a place where he may be served with any petition, or notice of any proceeding or order of the Court, relating to the trust fund.

9. Petitions presented, and affidavits filed, and rules entered, under the said Act, are to be entitled in the matter of the said Act, (11th and 12th Victoria, c. 68.) and in the matter of the particular trust.

22. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas an Act was passed in the 9 & 10 Vict. to facilitate the Employment of the Labouring Poor, in the distressed Districts in Ireland: And whereas Presentment Sessions have been held for certain baronies, half bar-onies, counties of cities, and counties of towns in Ireland, and presentments have been made thereat under the said recited act, and whereas the period for executing works under the said Act has expired, and several of the said works being unfinished, it is expedient that provision should be made, for the completion of the same: Be it enacted, that any three or more Justices of the peace, not being stipendiary magistrates, for any county in Ireland, may by notice under their hands to be posted on the places appointed for posting notices of applications to presentment sessions in the barony or half barony in which such works are proposed to be completed, convene a special meeting of the justices and cess-payers associated at the last special or presentment sessions held in such barony or half barony, under the 6 & 7 W. 4. c. 116. and such meeting shall be held at the place appointed for the holding of such sessions at the time specified in such notice not been sooner than seven days from the posting of such notice, and the secretary of the grand jury shall attend; and the justices and cess-payers, or so many of them as shall be present shall constitute a special presentment sessions for the purposes of this act: provided that before such meeting shall be convened the justices shall inquire from the county surveyor and determine the most convenient time time for holding such meeting, having regard to the report to be made by such county surveyor, under the provisions herein-after contained.

2. That all the provisions contained in the 6 & 7 W. 4. c. 116, relative to the selection of a chairman, and to his powers, duties and authorities at presentment sessions, and to the powers, duties, and authorities of justices and cess-payers at presentment sessions, shall, extend to all sessions under this act, and to the proceedings thereat; and that the provisions contained in the said act relating to the declarations to be made by the justices and cess-payers who shall act at any presentment sessions, and to the powers, duties and authorities of the secretaries of grand juries, county surveyors, clerks of the crown, clerks of the peace, and all other officers shall as amended by the 7 W. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 2, extend to all proceedings under this act, as if the same were herein repeated and enacted, unless where other provisions are hereby substituted; provided that in any declaration to be made by any justice or cess-payer the title of this act shall be inserted together with the title of the 6 & 7 W. 4 c. 116.

3. That the county surveyor shall report to the presentment sessions the nature and description of any public works for which presentments have been made at any extraordinary presentment sessions held for such barony or half barony, and the expense of which, or any part thereof, shall be chargeable thereon, and in respect to which advances have been made by her Majesty's Treasury under the 9 & 10 Vic. c. 107, and which works, or any part thereof, still remain unfinished; and such report shall be prepared by such county surveyor with all possible expedition after the passing of this act, and shall contain a description of the said works, and the townland, barony, or half barony wherein the same are situate, and shall specify the amount which has been authorised by Her Majesty's treasury to be applied to such works under the said last-mentioned act, and the amount unexpended, and the expense of completing such works and the utility thereof, and the barony or half barony by which the expense of completing the same should be defrayed.

4. That at the special sessions held for any barony or half barony under this act the justices and cess-payers associated at such sessions shall take such report into consideration, and decide by a majority of votes on the merits of the works specified and whether the same ought or ought not to be completed, and whether wholly or in part, or conditionally in the event of the expense thereof not exceeding a certain sum, and what modification thereof may be proper; and if such justices and cess-payers approve thereof they shall direct the county surveyor to prepare a form of tender for the execution of the same, together with such specifications, maps &c. as may be necessary, expressing the nature and extent of such work, and in case the same shall be a public road, the quantity per perch and the description of the material proper in the execution of the same, and the term within which such work ought to be completed, and such other particulars as the said justices and cess-payers shall think fit, and such chairman shall endorse on such report the decision of the said justices and cess-payers, and sign his name thereto, and deliver such report, to the secretary of the grand jury, and such county surveyor shall deliver such forms of tender, specifications, &c. as soon as convenient to the secretary of the grand jury; and the said justices and cess-payers shall appoint the manner in which notice for the receipt of tenders and proposals for the execution of such works shall be given, and the period during which they shall be received, and shall adjourn such sessions until an early day, for the opening of such sealed tenders and proposals, not being later than thirty days from the day of adjournment.

5. That the justice or justices and cess-payers at any sessions held under this act are authorised to make presentments for the completion of such public works within the barony or half barony for which such sessions shall be held, to be raised if they shall think fit, by instalments, not exceeding twenty, as the said justice or justices and cess-payers shall direct, with interest at five per cent. to be levied off the baronies or half baronies in which such works shall be situate, and chargeable therewith: provided that the amount to be presented shall not exceed the residue of the amount authorized to be applied to the execution of such works by Her Majesty's treasury under the first-recited act.

6. That the secretary of the grand jury for each county wherein special sessions have been held under this act shall cause to be made out, as soon as convenient, and shall sign, a schedule specifying each work approved and presented at any such sessions, and the sum presented, and shall transmit the same to the Lord Lieutenant for his sanction; and it shall be lawful for the said Lord Lieutenant, to signify to the secretary of the grand jury, by a certificate under the hand of the chief or under secretary, approval or disapproval of such works or any part thereof; and no work or part thereof so disapproved of shall be executed under this act.

7. That the secretary of the grand jury shall, upon being furnished by the county surveyor with the specification or form of tender for the execution of any work and the maps, plans, &c. belonging thereto, notify, by advertisement in such manner as the justices and cess-payers at such sessions shall direct his readiness to receive sealed tenders and proposals for the execution of any work during such period as shall have been appointed for the reception of the same, and the time to which such sessions has been adjourned for the opening of such tenders and proposals, and that forms thereof may be obtained at his office; and such secretary shall prepare a sufficient number of forms of tenders and proposals, and furnish to any person who shall demand the same a copy thereof, receiving therefor, the cost of preparing the same, not exceeding sixpence; and each of such sealed tenders and proposals shall contain a statement of the lowest sum for which the party is willing to contract for the performance of the work or works specified and described in such notification, with the name, description, and residence of the party so desirous to contract, and also the names, descriptions, and residences of two persons willing to be bound with him for the faithful performance of the said contract within the time and in the manner prescribed, in double the sum specified in such presentment; and all maps, plans, &c. relating to such work, shall be open to public inspection in the office of such secretary, without fee or reward.

8. That at the meeting of such adjourned sessions the secretary of the grand jury shall in court produce, duly numbered and arranged, and with the seals unbroken, all the tenders and proposals delivered to him, and shall open consecutively all those relating to the same work; and so soon as the lowest proposal for the performance of each work shall be ascertained the party making such proposal and his sureties shall be called, and if the said party and his sureties shall appear, and shall satisfy the justices and cess-payers of their sufficiency and ability to make good the penalty for the non-performance of such contract, and that such proposal has not been made for any unfair or fraudulent purpose, and shall enter into security for the performance of such contract, conditioned in such penalty as aforesaid, such proposal shall be accepted, and the party making the same shall be entitled to execute the work to which such proposal may refer unless there appear reason for rejecting it; but if the party making such proposal and his securities shall not appear, or shall fail to satisfy the justices and cess-payers at sessions in any of the particulars aforesaid, or shall decline to enter into security, or if the sessions shall see cause to reject it, then the proposal of the party making default shall be deemed null and void, and the next proposal shall be ascertained and dealt with in the same manner, and so on until the said security shall be entered into, and the contract completed: provided that if no proposal shall be made in respect of any work as so approved by the Lord Lieutenant within the time limited or if no proposal or tender shall be approved of by such sessions.

LIFE.

By the plan of the Union Society the profits are calculated upon the sum insured, and not upon the amount of Premiums paid, thus giving a most important advantage to young and middle ages; and for advanced lives the Tables of the Union offer the immediate benefit of lower rates of Premium. All new assurances participate.

The premiums are also much reduced on Insurances effected without Profits.

Detailed Prospectuses of the extended system of Life Insurances (in one case requiring payment of only two-thirds of the Premium) may be had gratis.

Loans granted on the Policies of this Office.

MR. SERJEANT STEPHEN'S NEW COMMENTARIES.
*Second Edition. Just published, in 4 vols. 8vo., 4*l.* 4*s.* cloth. (Dedicated, by permission, to her Majesty the Queen.)*

NEW COMMENTARIES on the LAWS of ENGLAND, in which are interwoven, under a New and Original Arrangement of the General Subject, all such parts of the Work of BLACKSTONE as are applicable to the present times; together with full but compendious Expositions of the Modern Improvements of the Law up to May, 1848; the Original and adopted Materials being throughout the Work Typographically distinguished from each other. By HENRY JOHN STEPHEN, Serjeant-at-Law. The Second Edition prepared for the press by JAMES STEPHEN, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

Extract from the Author's Advertisement to the present Edition: "The correction of the Work, in reference to the new Statutes and Cases (which are brought down to May, 1848,) and the revision of the Press in general, has been confided by the Author to his Son; his own retirement from professional practice, and the transfer of his attention to official duties, rendering him less competent than formerly to labours of that description. But the sheets have been invariably laid before him during the progress of the printing, and he feels himself able to vouch for their accuracy."

A full Prospectus, detailing the Contents, &c. of the Second Edition of this important work has been prepared, and may be had gratis, on application to the publishers.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER 11, 1848.

THE last Act in the Statute Book for last session—11 & 12 Vic. cap. 133, makes but little progress in the legislation which is necessary for the amendment of the whole system of laws relating to Savings' Banks, which requires thorough revision. We accept it, however, as a first instalment, deprecating that piecemeal legislation, which spreads in a detached and unsatisfactory shape the laws which regulate any particular subject, which should be combined in one comprehensive measure.

The late Act repeals so much of the 7 & 8 Vic. c. 83, s. 6, as exonerated Trustees or Managers from making good any deficiency, except they had in writing, deposited with the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, declared their willingness to be liable, and, instead of this senseless provision, which made Trustees practically irresponsible—leaves it in the power of a Trustee or Manager to limit his liability to a specific amount, which must at least amount to £100. It provides also for the appointment of Auditors, but leaves untouched the pre-existing rights, or rather wrongs, and remedies—or no remedies, of depositors.

The history of these institutions is of modern origin. It was not till the year 1817 that the Legislature made any provision for Savings' Banks, although before that period there were four such institutions existing in Ireland.

By the 57 Geo. 3, c. 105, being an Act entitled, "an Act to encourage the establishment of Banks for Savings in Ireland," it was enacted amongst others, that the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt should be authorized to allow for the deposits of Savings' Banks an interest of £4. 11s 3d., per cent. per annum, and as the same Act contained no restrictions as to the amount of the investments by the depositors, who might have deposits in as many banks as they pleased, it was inevitable from the high rate of interest, and unrestricted liberty of investment that classes of persons became depositors, for whom the benefits of this Act of Parliament were never intended. To remedy this abuse, the 5th Geo. 4. c. 62, sec. 21, (being the next Act passed regarding Savings' Banks in Ireland,) enacted, "that from and after the 20th of November, 1824, it shall not be lawful for the Trustees of any Savings' Bank in England and Ireland respectively to receive from any one depositor any sum or sums exceeding £50 in the whole, during the year then next ensuing, or exceeding £30 in the whole, exclusive of interest in any one year afterwards nor to receive from any depositor any sum or sums whatever which shall make the sum to which such depositor shall be entitled to, exceed the sum of £200 in the whole, exclusive of interest." The 35th sec. of 9 Geo. 4, c. 92, (which is at present in operation,) makes it illegal for the Trustees to receive more than £30 in the whole, exclusive of compound interest, in any one year, or to receive any sum or sums of money whatever which shall make the sum to which such depositor shall be entitled exceed £150, provided that when the sum, standing in the name of the depositor, amounts to £200, no interest shall be payable.

The 27th sec. of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 92, extends the amount of deposits in favour of the Trustees or Treasurers of any charitable or provident institution in England or Ireland for the maintenance of the poor, to £100 per annum, provided the amount invested shall not at any time exceed £300, exclusive of interest.

With the view of giving to the depositors, (in case of any disputes arising between them and the Trustees,) an easy and expeditious remedy, for recovering their demands, without the expense and difficulty of sustaining actions in the superior courts, the 45th sec. of the same Act, (9th Geo. 4, c. 92,) enacts "that if any dispute shall arise between any such institution and any individual depositor therein, or any executor, administrator next of kin, or creditor, then the matter shall be referred to the arbitration of two indifferent persons, one to be chosen and appointed by the Trustees or Manager, and the other by the party with whom the dispute arose, and in case the arbitrators shall not agree, then such matter shall be referred in writing to the Barrister-at-law to be appointed by the said Commissioners as aforesaid, who shall receive a fee of not more than one guinea, and whatever award, order, or determination shall be made, shall be binding and conclusive against all parties, and shall be final to all intents and purposes without any appeal.

The 14th sec. of the 7th & 8th Vic. c. 83, (Aug. 1844,) takes away from depositors the power of appointing an arbitrator, and refers the matter in dispute directly to the Barrister, whose award is final as before; the Barrister under the last section has also the power of proceeding ex parte on notice in writing to the Trustees and Managers. It would appear from the 8th section, which invests all the property in the Trustees or Trustees of such institution for the time being, that the awards of the Barrister must be against the Trustees as Trustees, and that in no case can they be personally liable, except when the funds are misapplied. The cases of Crisp v. Bunbury, (8 Bing. 394,) and Ring v. Midenhall Savings Bank, (6 A. & Ell. 952,) have decided that the 45th section took away the jurisdiction of the courts of law, whilst Cooke v. Courtown, (6 Ir. Eq. Rep. 266) establishes that a suit in Equity cannot be maintained by a depositor against the Trustees, on the ground that arbitration as directed by the statute is the only mode of proceeding in case of disputes between the depositors and the Bank; the late Act makes no alteration in the manner of proceeding by depositors. In the case of Cooke v. Lord Courtown, the Bank had closed without paying the depositors, and it certainly appears very questionable whether the jurisdiction of a court of Equity was removed by the 45th sec. of 9 Geo. 4, c. 9. It appeared a very reasonable construction, that the arbitration clause only applied to cases where the institution was existing, and the dispute arose between the Trustees and an individual depositor, and not to cases where the Bank closed, and there was a complicated account to be taken. The question was raised on demurrer, and the case was never carried farther. It seems at variance with the spirit of our constitution that questions of such magnitude should be left to the adjudication of one individual, from whom there is no appeal, and there is an obvious defect springing from the arbitration system, that the acts do not give a summary mode of recovering the awards when decreed by the Barrister.

Before the depositor can be in any way benefitted by the award he must bring an action into the superior courts to recover the amount, and thus be harassed with the delay and expense, from which it was the object of the Legislature to free him. Chief Justice Tindal, in his judgment in Crisp v. Bunbury, after deciding that the remedy by action was taken away, and that by arbitration substituted, proceeds, "It is evident, I hope, that the Legislature contemplated the cheap, simple, easy and equitable adjustment of all disputes by a reference in the mode pointed out in the Act, instead of the more expensive, dilatory, and uncertain remedy by action at law, and we think that we should defeat that very serviceable object, serviceable alike to the depositor and the institution, unless we construe the words, used, as words which import an obligation to refer, and take away the right to sue in the superior courts." We conceive the intentions of the Legislature, as declared by the learned judge, are not carried out, in the absence of a summary mode of enforcing the awards.

We think the appointment of auditors, given by the third section of the late Act, and their certificate as to the half-yearly inspection of the depositor's books, required by the fifth section, will be found to insure greater accuracy and correctness in the annual returns of the accounts to the Commissioners, than has yet been attained. Whilst the 46 sec. of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 92, merely require that the Trustees should annually cause a general statement to be prepared, shewing the balance or principal sum due to all the depositors collectively; the third sec. of the late Act enacts, "That Trustees of every Savings Bank shall cause the annual and other statements required to be transmitted under the Acts relating to Savings Banks, to be certified and verified by the auditor or auditors appointed by the said Trustees, in addition to the attestation by Trustees and Managers now required by the said Act, and shall also cause a certificate from the said auditor or auditors as to the result of his or their examination of such of the depositors books, as may have been produced to him or them for examination, to be transmitted with the said annual statement to the said Commissioners."

This last sec. must be taken along with the 5th which enacts, "That the rules of the Savings Banks in Ireland shall specify a number of days, not less than two, in every year, ending the 20th of Nov., on which the book of each depositor shall be produced at the office of the said Savings Bank, for the purpose of being inspected, examined and verified with the books of the institution by the auditor or auditors, and in case the said book shall not be produced on or before the last of the days mentioned in any one year ending as aforesaid, the said account shall be closed, and all interest shall cease to accrue on the sums deposited from the Saturday of the year in which the said books should have been so produced, in the case of any depositor who shall have received notice to produce his said book, and of any depositor in a Savings Bank, the rules of which provide for the production of deposit book once in each year. Provided, nevertheless, that the Trustees or Managers shall have the power to re-open the said account, but only to allow interest thereon from the time when the same shall be re-opened, unless the Trustees shall be satisfied that such depositor has been prevented by some sufficient cause from producing the deposit book at the time so specified, and an extract of this provision shall be enrolled as one of the rules of every Savings Bank."

If these provisions, which are entirely new, be faithfully carried out by the auditor or auditors, co-operating with the Trustees or Managers, it will be impossible for any deficiency in the funds to arise of more than one year's growth, without the knowledge of the Commissioners of the National Debt, who have power, under the 7th sec. to close the account, and to discontinue any further account with the Trustees. A power, similar to that contained in the last-mentioned section, is given to the Commissioners under the 46th sec. of the 9th Geo. 4, c. 92, but though from recent investigations into the affairs of the Savings Banks, the deficiency in the funds have been found annually to have increased, they did not think it necessary to exercise this power. We believe, however, that the appointment of auditors will guarantee to the Commissioners an accurate annual statement of accounts for the future, and so enable them to form a correct judgment as to the affairs of the Banks. The expense attending the appointment of these officers need not be considerable, as the Trustees have the power of agreeing with the Trustees of any other Savings Bank, as to the appointment of a common auditor. In point of fact, one or two individuals could perform all the duties required by the Act of Parliament, while the advantage to the depositors of having responsible officers to examine into the affairs of the Banks, would go far to restore, in the minds of the industrious classes, depositing their savings in these institutions, that confidence which has been so much shaken by the recent stoppages.

The Act to facilitate the sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland, with an Introduction, Commentary, Forms, and Index, by Hamilton Smythe, Esq.
The Act to facilitate the sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland, with a copious Index, Second Edition, with Forms, by William Macartney McCay, Solicitor.

We agree with Mr. Smythe that no Act of Parliament since the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, has been passed of such importance to Ireland as the Act for the sale of incumbered estates; within three weeks after it became law, Mr. McCay had published his work, which has already seen a second edition, and which contains a careful analysis of the measure, and a good index. Mr. Smythe has successfully followed the plan which he adopted in his former publication on Mr. Pigott's act, and in his introduction has given a succinct epitome of the late statute. We gladly avail ourselves of the assistance of a member of each profession in considering this very important measure, which cannot yet be said to be fairly in operation, the Chancellor and Master of the Rolls not having as yet published their General Orders "for better carrying the Act into effect." It cannot be doubted that facilities for the transfer of incumbered estates were desirable, and their necessity was precipitated by the recent famine, and the consequent pressure of an ill-adjusted Poor Law, which cast the burden of supporting poverty upon the embarrassed landlord, whilst the incumbrancer was exempt from contribution to the ruinous taxation, which weighed so unequally upon his debtor.

From various causes springing from the distress of the country, land in abundance will be thrown into the market. Let us examine the process by which it will be brought to the judicial hammer.

1st by sale under the order of the Court. The owner of an incumbered estate may contract out of Court, and apply afterwards for its approval of the contract, or may apply to the Court in the first instance for a sale; an incumbrancer cannot contract except under the direction of the Court.

The proceedings are to be by petition. This is a very important change in the practice of courts of Equity, bills, answers, replications, proofs, first hearing and decree to account, are all swept away, and we are free to confess that in ordinary cases where no discovery on oath is required, the change is a salutary one, the proceeding by petition will be more inexpensive and more rapid; we by no means undervalue the advantage of obtaining an admission on oath, nor the power which a plaintiff possesses of "laying naked the heart of the defendant," but in all friendly suits—and the numerous short causes which are set down term after term, may be cited as instances—every step preliminary to going to the Master's office was a useless expense.

We are aware in making this statement, that in cases where cause is shewn against making an order of reference on the petition, it will be inconvenient to try the question on affidavits, but the exceptional cases will not counterbalance the benefit generally conferred on the suitor. The seventh section directs that the petition shall set forth the interest of the petitioner, and the uses, limitations, and trusts to which the land stands limited, and the incumbrances affecting it, and shall be verified as the Court shall direct.

We know not whether the new General Orders will direct, that the affidavit to verify the petition should state that the uses and trusts, incumbrances and charges set forth in the petition are the only ones affecting the lands, but we think it desirable this should be so, because thus, before any step is taken, due examination of the title will have been made, and an accurate knowledge acquired of the state of the property, and on both these points the Court will have perfect information, and random litigation will be checked. It would prevent the springing up of a practice similar to that of putting an imperfect bill on the file, requiring extensive amendments afterwards. Two courses could have been adopted—either a short statement of the petitioner's estate, or of the incumbrance, as the case may be,—and of the lands desired to be sold; or a complete one, setting out every limitation and incumbrance; the former would not satisfy the requisitions of the statute, and the latter will probably be found the most economical in the end; one of the objects for which the Chancellor and Master of the Rolls are empowered to make General Orders being in order that the proceedings "may be done," (the language is that of the statute, not ours,) "with the least cost." These Orders are to be laid before the Houses of Parliament within a specified period, but from the time of their being made are for all purposes to be deemed a General Rule and Order of the Court; by this means their operation will not be suspended until the next Session, nor does there appear to be any necessity for laying them before Parliament at all, the only reason for doing so would be, that they would thus become incorporated with the Act, and incapable of variation, which would be a disadvantage, and not designed in this case, as by the next section there is a power given to rescind, or alter them. Great additional labour will be thrown on the Chancellor in reading petitions, but we do believe that to prevent the same ground from being travelled over again in the Master's office, the petition should be full and accurately prepared from negative searches verified by affidavit; with that petition, fiat, searches, and affidavit, the Master could at once proceed to take the accounts, and direct service to be made on every person interested, as stated in the petition; without these he will be at sea, and the charge—or statement of his case in the Master's office—of the petitioner will be, in point of fact, a bill transferred to a worse tribunal, where slovenliness of statement, and inaccuracy of pleading may flourish unchecked.

We assume that the order of reference has been made, and the petitioner fairly launched in the Master's office, and we believe that the Legislature gave themselves a great deal of unnecessary trouble in preparing the 10th section. It endeavours to set out in detail the various particulars which an order of reference may direct. This was unnecessary, and would have been better done by a few general words. Having disposed of the reference, it proceeds to confer powers upon Master and Court, and contains the following provision, to which Mr. Smythe has called our attention: "And for any of the purposes of this Act the said Court shall have power to compel the production before the Master of all deeds and other writings relating to any property in question, provided always that no incumbrancer or other person being in possession of any title deeds or writings, of or relating to any property, (and showing right to hold the same, as a security for a debt or charge,) or lien shall be compellable to produce the same, unless or until it shall have been ascertained by the report of the Master, that the money to be produced by the sale of the property, and applicable to the payment of such debt or charge will be sufficient to pay the same, but such incumbrancer or other person shall, on the order of the Court, furnish copies or extracts of any such deeds or writings."

We should be glad to have a key to the meaning of the Legislature; the foregoing extract is, to our comprehension, so obscure as to be unintelligible. Assuming that the words "or lien" should be included in the parenthesis, we venture to ask, how can the Master, in those cases, where there has been no contract for sale, ascertain whether the money to be produced by a sale will be sufficient to pay the possessor of the title deeds? it can only be a matter of speculation, and even supposing that he could, is there to be a separate report as to that fact by the Master before the production of title deeds can be compelled? and it is observable that it could not be even approximately ascertained until all the incumbrances were proved, and their priorities known, so that for no practical purpose could the deeds be obtained, except to hand over to the purchaser. Neither does this unfortunate section confer on the holder of the deeds, the benefit it was intended, for the Court has the power to compel the incumbrancer to furnish copies or abstracts, and if he be thus obliged to disclose his title-deeds, their value becomes a negative quantity, the petitioner obtains all the information he requires, and a condition of sale that the purchaser shall only require compared copies, will bring the estate into market, without any imperative necessity for the original deeds.

The section was prepared in England, where the law of lien is of much more importance than in this country. Here it has been decided, that the lien of a solicitor, cannot prevail against an incumbrance created prior to the costs, being incurred, for which the lien is claimed Smith v. Chichester, (2 Dru. and War. 393), and it would appear that where the production is once enforced, the benefit of a solicitor's lien is lost, even against incumbrances, subsequent to the lien, Blunden v. Desart (2 Dru. and War. 405).

We had hoped in this article to have conducted the petitioner safely through the Master's Office, but the progress both to the suitor and writer is slower than we did, or the former may anticipate; we must reserve further discussion to a future number.

sions, it shall and may be lawful for the said sessions, to give such work to the county surveyor, with power to expend a sum not exceeding the maximum so approved as aforesaid; who shall cause such work to be executed, and account for the execution thereof to the grand jury at the following assizes.

9. That such security so to be entered into by contractors and their sureties shall be a recognizance to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and of like force, as other recognizance made to the Queen's Majesty, and at such adjourned sessions any justice present is authorized to take such recognizance, and the secretary of the grand jury shall prepare and come provided with same, so as to prevent delay; and the expense of preparing same, not exceeding sixpence, shall be defrayed by the party entering thereinto; and such recognizances shall be preserved in custody of such secretary until the condition thereof shall have been fulfilled, and shall then be delivered up to the contractor therein named, or to any person by him duly authorized.

10. That the secretary of the grand jury shall have charge of all contracts, and shall provide a book in which he shall insert an abstract of all such contracts, setting out the names of the contractors, and the particulars of each contract, and all contracts so entered shall be numbered, and every book shall have an alphabetical index referring to the number of each contract; and such secretary shall, as soon as may be, prepare schedules of all reports and certificates for works so contracted for, approved of, and presented, and cause the same to be printed and distributed in the manner be by the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 116, required to do with respect to applications approved of at Presentment Sessions, and shall immediately deliver all such reports of works to the clerk of the crown for the county to which the same shall relate, who shall preserve the same, and within seven days deliver to the treasurer of such county, without fee or reward, a copy thereof, attested upon oath, and signed by himself; and such treasurer shall return the same to the foreman of the grand jury, when they shall be first empanelled at the ensuing Spring Assizes; and all the powers, authorities, or provisions given in the said last-mentioned act in relation to works, or the execution of the same, and the levying the expense of the same, shall, as far as not inconsistent with this act, be applied to the works under this act, and the several forms in the schedule to the said last-mentioned act shall be applied, or altered, as occasion may require, in the several proceedings under this act.

11. That the secretary of the grand jury for each county upon receiving the certificate of approval of the Lord Lieutenant of any public works presented for under this act, shall lay before the grand jury, at the next assizes or presenting term, such certificate with a schedule under his hand, attested upon oath, of the presentments for the works so approved, by the Lord Lieutenant, and contracted for or given in charge to the surveyor, and also specifying the sums under this act to be raised for such works within such barony or half barony and the number and amount of instalments, in which such sum is to be raised, with interest as aforesaid; and every such grand jury, are hereby required, to present the sum or instalments, mentioned in such certificate of approval and schedule in the manner therein approved, to be raised off the baronies or half baronies, within which such works shall be situate: provided that if the grand jury shall fail to present the sum, or the instalment, specified in any such certificate and schedule, the treasurer of such county is hereby required to insert such sum, or such omitted part, or such instalment, in his warrant for raising the monies presented at the same assizes, as if same had been presented by such grand jury to be raised off such barony or half barony, and the sum or instalment shall be raised accordingly, and in the case of sums to be so raised by instalments such treasurer shall in like manner, and without further presentment or authority insert a like instalment or sum in his warrant for raising the sums presented at each succeeding assizes, until the whole sum payable for each such work shall, with interest, be levied as aforesaid, and the same shall be levied accordingly; and the provisions of the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 116, with reference to the raising, apportionment, collection, levy, or recovery of grand jury cess, and the payment of the same by the treasurer, shall, apply to all such sums of money so inserted in such warrant.

12. That the treasurer of any county in which presentment shall have been made for the completion of any work under this act, and approved by the Lord Lieutenant may borrow, upon security of the presentment, any sum not exceeding the amount approved for the purpose of completing any such work, with such interest thereon as shall be stated in the presentment; and if any person shall agree with the treasurer to advance the amount of such presentment, or of any instalment thereof, and shall pay the same into the bank with which the said treasurer has his public account, to the credit of the said account, the said treasurer may give a draft upon the said bank for the amount so advanced and which draft shall be countersigned by the clerk of the crown of the county, and shall be made payable to the payee or his order, with interest as aforesaid, at the assizes at which the said presentment ought to be paid under this act; and any sum advanced as aforesaid shall be applied by the said treasurer in like manner as the said presentment or instalment is directed to be applied under this act.

13. That in cases where the cost of executing any work shall exceed twenty pounds the justices or justice and cess-payers, at any such sessions, may authorize the treasurer of the county, out of any funds under his control, to advance to the contractor or county surveyor to whom such work shall be given in charge and presented under this act, upon his application, any sum not exceeding three fourths of the costs of such work: provided that no such advances shall be made unless such application shall be accompanied by a certificate signed by the county surveyor, that more than the sum applied for has been honestly expended upon the work.

14. That any person who may have contracted for the execution of any work under this act may, on the completion of the work if within 1848, give notice thereof by post, addressed to the county surveyor at his office, who shall, by himself or his assistants, within fifteen days from the receipt of such notice, examine the work so completed, and in case he shall be fully satisfied of the execution of such work, shall grant his certificate of approval to such contractor, which shall set forth the amount to be paid, and description and number of the contract on account of which payment is to be made.

15. That the treasurer of such county, upon the production of such certificate, shall give to the person entitled to such payment a draft for the amount which draft shall contain a specification of the purposes for which the same shall have been drawn, and of the person to whom payable, and when so signed it shall be the authority for the bankers in whose bank the county funds may be deposited to pay the amount thereof, any thing in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 53, intituled an act to amend an act of the last session of parliament, for providing more effectual means to account for public monies, and to secure the same to the contrary notwithstanding, and such draft shall be as valid as any draft for the payment of money given under the said last-mentioned act; provided that after the expiration of 1848 the contractors shall make application for and receive payment subject to the provisions of the acts relating to the presentment of public monies by grand juries in Ireland.

16. And whereas it may be expedient to complete public works in certain baronies and half baronies in Ireland commenced under the said first-recited act, and which remain unfinished, although the amount authorised to be applied to the execution of such works by the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury under the said act shall have been expended, or shall not be sufficient to complete such work; the secretary of the grand jury of any county in Ireland in any barony or half barony of which a special presentment sessions shall have been held under this act, is hereby required, by notice to be posted at the usual places of posting public notices, to convene a special sessions for the county, to be holden in the county court house, for the purposes of this act, at the time specified in such notice, not being sooner than seven days from the posting such notice nor later than six weeks, after the first special presentment sessions shall have been held for any barony or half barony within such county under this act.

17. That every Justice for such county, not being a stipendiary magistrate, may attend and are hereby required to assemble, and with the cess-payers associated, as herein-after appointed, to hold such special sessions for the purposes of this act, at the said county court house, at the time specified in the said notice; and the secretary of the grand jury shall attend; and the said justices and cess-payers present shall constitute a special sessions for the purposes of this act; and the several provisions contained in the said act of the 6 & 7 W.4, c.116 relating to the selection of a chairman, and the powers, duties and authorities of such chairman and of justices and cess-payers at county presentment sessions, and relating to adjourned sessions for opening tenders and the making of contracts thereat, and relating to the declarations by the justices and cess-payers who shall act at any county presentment session, and also relating to the powers, duties, and authorities of the secretaries of grand juries, county surveyors, clerks of the crown, clerks of the peace, and all other officers shall, as amended by 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 2, as far as the same are applicable, or necessary for carrying out this act, and not inconsistent with such provisions, extend to all proceedings at the special sessions to be held under this act, as if the same were herein repeated and enacted, unless where other provisions are hereby substituted; provided that in any declaration by any such justice or cess-payer the title of this act shall be inserted together with the title of 6 & 7 W.4 c. 116.

18. That the justices and cess payers associated at each special presentment sessions for any barony or half barony under this act shall select one of the said cess-payers for every barony or half barony to be associated with the justices of the county as a member of the said special sessions, and the secretary of the grand jury shall make out a list of the persons so chosen at such special sessions and shall forthwith notify the same, and the day appointed for such special sessions, to them, and shall read out the list previous to the appointment of the chairman for the said sessions; and the secretary of the grand jury shall place before such sessions the reports made by the county surveyor to the special sessions held for any barony or half barony, or baronies or half baronies, within the county, as the same shall have been endorsed by the chairman thereof under this act; and the justices and cess-payers associated in the said special sessions shall take such reports into consideration as far as the same shall relate to works in respect of which no residue shall remain unexpended of the amount authorised by Her Majesty's treasury to be applied to the execution of the same, under the said first-recited act, or in respect of which the residue shall not be sufficient to complete such works, and shall decide with a majority of voices, on the merits of each of such works, and whether the same ought to be completed, and whether wholly or in part, or conditionally in the event of the expense thereof not exceeding a certain sum, and what modification thereof, may be proper and in case of their approval of the completion of any modification thereof, shall give directions respecting the forms of tender for the same; and all the powers, authorities, or provisions given or contained in this act in relation to works approved of wholly or in part at special sessions held for any barony or half barony, and the execution of the same and the approval of the same by the Lord Lieutenant, and in relation to presenting monies or raising or levying monies presented for the execution of such works, and borrowing money on the security of such presentment, and making advances to contractors in respect of the same, and otherwise relating to such monies or such works, shall extend, as far as the same are applicable, to all works approved of wholly or in part at any such special presentment sessions held under this act.

19. And whereas by 1 Vic c. 54, it was enacted, that every treasurer then in office, shall have and receive the interest due on exchequer bills purchased from any balance standing to the credit of such treasurer's account, so that such interest does not exceed one half of the salary appertaining to his office; and whereas it is just that such treasurer, and that the bank which the grand jury shall have appointed for receiving the public monies of such county should be allowed interest on sums paid or advanced by such treasurer or bank under this act; be it, &c. that the officer whom the Lord Lieutenant has authorized or may hereafter authorize to audit and declare the accounts of the treasurers of counties in Ireland under the last-mentioned act may and he is hereby required on being applied to by any treasurer entitled to receive interest under this said act, or if any bank having made any advance above the balance at the credit of such county, to ascertain the amount of interest at the rate of five per cent. which would be due to such treasurer or bank on the amount so advanced under Act, remaining unpaid, from the time which such money shall have been paid by the treasurer of such county or such bank until the same shall have been discharged, or until the first day of the assizes next succeeding such application, and to certify the same to the secretary of the grand jury, and it shall be lawful for any grand jury and they are hereby required to present to the said treasurer or bank such interest so due, which interest shall be paid to such treasurer or bank out of any balance in hand, and shall be raised and levied off the barony or half barony liable to pay such sums.

20. And be it enacted, that the word "county" shall include county of a city or county of a town; and that all the provisions of this act may extend and be applied to any county of a city or county of a town in Ireland.

21. And be it enacted, that the word "treasurer" shall, as to the county of Dublin, mean and include the "Finance Committee," and the word "assizes" shall, as to the said county of Dublin, mean and include the "presenting term," and the word "county surveyor" shall, as to the said county of Dublin, mean and include the "district surveyor;" and that an act passed in the 7 & 8 Vict.c.106, shall, with reference to the raising applotting, levying, or recovering of grand jury cess, and to the powers for the execution of works, apply, as to the said county of Dublin, to sums of money to be presented, and the works to be executed under this act.

22. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

GAP. II.

An Act for the better prevention of crime and outrage in certain parts of Ireland until the 1st day of December 1849 and to the end of the then next session of parliament.

‘Whereas, in consequence of the prevalence of crime in parts of Ireland, it is necessary to make provision for the prevention thereof:’ be it enacted by the Queen’s, &c. that whenever, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland shall deem it necessary, to prevent crime and outrage, it shall be lawful to and for the Lord Lieutenant to declare by proclamation, to be published in the “Dublin Gazette,” that from and after a day to be named in such proclamation this act shall apply to any county, county of a city, or county of a town, or any barony or baronies, half barony or half baronies, in any county at large, or any district of less extent than any barony or half barony, in Ireland: provided that it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant to revoke any proclamation under this act, as to the whole or part of the district named in any such proclamation; and thereupon the original proclamation shall, from and after a day to be named in such new proclamation be revoked so far as such new proclamation shall purport to revoke the same.

2. That copies of every proclamation of this act shall be posted on the doors of all places of worship and of every police station within the district named in such proclamation, and at the foot of every such first mentioned proclamation so posted as aforesaid an abstract of this act shall be printed, for the information of all persons affected by the enactments herein contained.

3. That from the day named in any such first-mentioned proclamation it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant during the period for which such proclamation shall be in force, to appoint so many additional sub-inspectors, head constables and other constables, and sub-constables, as he shall think proper, for any county, &c. provided that it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant if he shall think proper, at any time during the continuance of any proclamation, to withdraw the said sub-inspectors &c. so appointed from the district for which they shall have been so appointed.

4. That all and every the powers in the 6 & 7 W. 4. c. 13 shall extend and apply to the sub-inspectors, &c. appointed under this act.

5. That in addition to the number of sub-inspectors, &c. which by any former act the Lord Lieutenant is empowered to appoint a reserve force, it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant to appoint two sub-inspectors, four head constables, and any number not exceeding two hundred additional constables and sub-constables, who shall be deemed to be a part of the said force, and shall be subject to all and every the provisions applicable to the said force under any act now in force.

6. That it shall and may be lawful to and for the lord high treasurer, or the commissioners of Her Majesty’s treasury, or any three or more of them, for the time being, to order that any such sum as he or they shall think proper shall from time to time be advanced out of the produce of the consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for the payment of the several salaries and allowances, and the purchase of arms, accoutrements, bridles, saddles, appointments, houses, outhouses, furniture, and accommodations, proper for the use of the constabulary to be appointed under this act, and also for all rents and taxes payable for such houses and for repairing all such houses and for the forage of such horses and for the expenses of Sub-inspectors, &c. when they shall be absent from their residences, under the authority of this act, and for all necessary costs, incurred in the execution of this act; and all money so issued shall be paid to the receiver of the constabulary force of Ireland, with such securities and under such rules as the said Lord High Treasurer, or Her Majesty’s Treasury, shall from time to time direct.

7. That whenever the Lord Lieutenant &c. shall appoint any such additional sub-inspectors, &c. for any County, &c. under this act such monies advanced out of the consolidated fund as shall be declared by the Lord Lieutenant to relate to such county &c. shall be levied and collected in the manner herein-after mentioned.

8. That whenever the Lord Lieutenant shall appoint any such additional sub-inspector, &c. for any county, &c. under this act, he shall cause an estimate to be made for the three months next after such appointment, and so from time to time for every successive three months during which such sub-inspector, &c. shall remain in such county, &c. of the expenses of such sub-inspector, &c. and the proportion thereof to be paid by each barony, &c. and when any such estimate shall have been made the Lord Lieutenant may issue his warrant, directed to the collectors appointed under the 6 & 7 W.4. c. 116. relating to the Grand Juries in Ireland, requiring such collectors to levy within their districts the sums mentioned in such warrants together with such fees as to the said Lord Lieutenant shall seem proper, not exceeding ninepence in the pound upon the sum to be levied; and every such collector is hereby required forthwith to levy the sums mentioned in his warrant in the manner mentioned in the said last recited act, and to pay over same to the receiver for the constabulary force of Ireland, to be by him applied as the lord high treasurer, or the commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury or any three of them, shall appoint; and every such warrant shall be in full force for two years after the date thereof, notwithstanding the death, resignation, or removal of the person to whom it was originally directed, unless the sums mentioned therein shall have been sooner levied and shall be put in execution by the collector appointing under the said last-recited act for the district mentioned in such warrant; and any security given by any collector or his securities for the execution of his duties under the said recited act shall extend to the provisions of this act: provided that whenever any proclamation shall cease to be in force an account shall be made up by the receiver for the constabulary of Ireland, of the expenses of such sub-inspector, &c. and if such expenses shall exceed the amount of the estimates such excess shall be raised by presentment off the county, &c. for which such estimate shall have been made, the amount being ascertained and certified as directed by the 6d & 7 W. 4 and if such expenses be less than the estimates all monies paid over to the receiver beyond the amount of such expenses, shall be repaid by him to the treasurer of the county to be retained to the credit of such district, and the amount shall be deducted from the next collection required & 7 W. 4.

9. And be it enacted, that from the day named in any proclamation, and during the time same shall be in force, it shall not be lawful for any person whomsoever (except justices of peace, persons in Her Majesty's naval or military service or in the coast guard, or revenue, or in the constabulary force of special constables, or persons licensed to kill game, or persons licensed under this act, to carry or have within the district specified in such proclamation, elsewhere than in his or her own dwelling house, any gun, pistol, &c. or any part of any gun, pistol, &c. or any sword, &c. or ammunition; and every person carrying or having any gun, or ammunition contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to be imprisoned with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.

10. That any person whomsoever may apprehend any person found carrying any gun, or part of any gun, pistol, &c. or ammunition, contrary to this act, and to deliver such person into the custody of a constable or peace officer, and it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, constable, or peace officer to search any person whom he may suspect to be carrying or having any arms or ammunition, contrary to this Act, and to take same from such person for the use of Her Majesty.

11. That from the day named in any such proclamation it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant by notice published in the "Dublin Gazette," and posted to require all persons not being justices of the peace (except justices of the peace, persons in Her Majesty's naval or military service in the coast guard or revenue, or in the constabulary force, or special constables, or persons licensed to kill game, or persons licensed under this act), within any county, &c. or other district named in any proclamation, on or before a day to be named in such notice to leave at a place therein named or at the nearest police station or barrack any arms, or ammunition, in his, her, or their possession; and all arms, and ammunition, left as aforesaid, shall be kept in safe custody until the Lord Lieutenant shall otherwise order, or such proclamation shall cease to be then restored to the owner in such manner as the said Lord Lieutenant shall direct: provided that no person carrying any arms or any ammunition, for the purpose only of depositing same as herein-before mentioned, shall be deemed a person carrying or having arms or ammunition, contrary to this act.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER 18, 1848.

THERE is no subject more vitally interesting to the Irish public, than the Irish poor laws. The cottier—separated by an almost infinitesimal distinction from the pauper, for whose support he is taxed—and the lord of the soil, alike feel heavily their burthen. The deliberate opinion of the select committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into their operation—so far as related to the rating of immediate lessors—that those laws called for a more extensive enquiry, warrants the expectation that they will undergo a revision during the next session of parliament; and meantime it is of great importance that public opinion should be directed to their defects. To assist in this desirable object, we shall investigate, seriatim, the working of the poor law, pointing out its defects, as well as the means by which (in our judgment) they might be remedied.

In this investigation we shall adopt the following order. We shall consider the working of the poor law—in the striking—in the levying—and in the spending of the rate; other important subjects—the area of taxation—the species of property exempt—and the inequalities in its pressure, will be discussed afterwards.

For the striking of a rate, there is requisite the valuation of the rateable property, and the construction of the rate books; under this head we shall also notice the subject of appeals.

Under the first poor law act, the occupying tenant was, in every instance, primarily liable, and hence in the original valuation, the holding of each occupying tenant was valued separately. This valuation (though the act provides for its being done satisfactorily) was made in a loose and inaccurate manner—the valuator arriving at the extent and value of each holding, either by estimation, or from the account obtained from the occupying tenants themselves; and upon this valuation the original rate books were framed, and which were in the following form:—First, there was a column containing the common numerals, from one to the number of occupying tenants in the townland, frequently beyond 100; in another column were set down, opposite the numbers, the names of the occupying tenants; in a third, that of the immediate lessor; in another, the supposed acreable extent of each tenant's holding; and in another its supposed value. When the law was altered, by which the immediate lessor became primarily liable for all holdings where their value did not exceed £4, the rate books were altered by omitting the names of the occupying tenants for those small holdings, and generally all names for which owners could not be found—thus rendering the immediate lessors liable in all these cases; and this (except that some few alterations have been made from time to time on appeal) is the present state of the rate books.

The books thus framed are open, at specified times, to the inspection of all persons concerned; and here the ratepayer may learn that he is liable in a certain townland to certain numbers (51, or 87, or 100) in the rate book, as the case may be; but what particular holdings these numbers refer to, he has no means of ascertaining.

The rate payer, if he believes himself overcharged, may appeal. To effect this he must give fourteen days notice to the clerk of the Guardians, and to every other person concerned in the event of the appeal—those will be the immediate lessor or lessors, whoever they may be, and all the occupying tenants of the townland. He must besides enter into personal recognizances that he will prosecute the appeal at the next Quarter Sessions. It must be observed that his time for appeal is very limited, for if a Quarter Session take place one month after the striking of the rate, he must then appeal or not at all; and, considering that the rate books are not exhibited for inspection for some time after the rate is struck, and that the appellant must give fourteen days notice to a great variety of parties, he will find it very difficult to comply with the requisites; besides, the justices and assistant-barrister are precluded from inquiring into any cases, or with respect to any person or persons other than those mentioned and specified in the notice, so that this notice must be very special; and in a thickly tenanted townland, or one in which the rights of property are complicated, (as where properties are held in common or in coparcenery), may be very voluminous.

But the appellant has still further difficulties to contend with from the loose way in which the rate books are constructed. As before observed, he can only learn from the rate book that he is chargeable for certain numbers in a townland, but he cannot learn from it what particular portion of the townland that number refers to. In the case of an occupying tenant, he may be able to satisfy the Assistant Barrister that he does not hold more than a certain quantity of land, and that it is not of more than a certain value; but in the case of an immediate lessor, he has nothing tangible—all he knows is, that he is held liable for particular numbers in the rate book, and the rate collector, or any other officer, can give him no information as to what particular holdings those numbers refer; he can only adopt a sort of exhausting process, fixing as many of the occupying tenants as he can with liability, and to a certain amount; and thus establishing that he is liable only to the balance of the rate due on the whole townland. This process in appealing clearly imposes on the Assistant Barrister and justices the duties which should have been discharged by a valuator.

There is another considerable inconvenience to the appellant, arising from the fact that Quarter Sessions are not held four times a year in all Quarter Sessions towns. Strange as it sounds, in some Quarter Sessions towns they are only held once in a year, and hence the appellant is frequently obliged to attend, with his witnesses, at a distant place, and of course, at a considerable expense;—when the great size of some of the Quarter Sessions districts is remembered, this will be admitted to be no small grievance. To attend the next Quarter Sessions, as required by the act, an appellant would sometimes be obliged to undertake a journey of 60 miles, which, with waiting his turn, and returning 60 miles, would detain him, and perhaps several witnesses a week or ten days from home.

It seems monstrously absurd, that in the same country two land-taxes should be based on separate and independant valuations, the one (for the county-tax, and which is far the lighter,) conducted with the most mathematical accuracy as to extent, and scientific investigation as to value; the other, (for the poor-rate,) conducted in a loose and slovenly manner, and admittedly most unsatisfactory. The townland sheets of the ordnance survey and their valuation by the same department, afford the most complete and beautiful basis for a system of taxation that can be conceived; and if the valuations under the poor-law only annexed the townland sheets of the ordnance-survey to the rate-books, exhibiting on each townland the several holdings into which it is divided, having each holding numbered, and having corresponding numbers in the rate-books, and submitted the townland sheets, so divided and numbered, with the rate-books, for the inspection of the rate-payers—most of the difficulty adverted to would be got rid of at once, all disputes as to the valuation of holdings would be settled by a valuator, and if an appeal were still necessary, much of the difficulty would be removed, both as to the evidence, which should be produced, and as to the parties who should be noticed.

By giving the appeal to the next Quarter Sessions which might take place in the town nearest to the appellant, provided it were not within two months of the striking of the rate, waiving the necessity of recognizances to prosecute the appeal, guarding against those that were frivolous, by giving costs against the appellant, and attaching the townland sheets of the ordnance survey, exhibiting the separate holdings, numbered as above—to the rate-books, and submitting them together to the inspection of the rate-payers, would present nothing objectionable in this department of the poor-law—extending the time for appealing could not injure the guardians, as they could levy the tax notwithstanding the appeal.

WE this week continue our examination of the act for the sale of encumbered estates, and proceed to the discussion of the provisions for the practical working of the measure in the Master's office. The 11th section directs that the proceedings now in force in suits for foreclosure, or for sale of estates for payment of incumbrances, shall apply, where applicable, to proceedings under this act, and enacts that all persons who shall become parties to proceedings even "by attending before the Master in the course of such proceedings, or by otherwise concurring in any such proceedings," and their representatives shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the court and Master.

It would seem that appearing before the Master is considered concurring in the proceedings, at least we collect this from the use of the words "attending before the Master, or otherwise concurring;" so that the object of the party appearing is immaterial, his attendance will be sufficient to bind him; where this result is apprehended, the safer course will be to lodge a caveat with the registrar, as directed by the 17th sec. by which means the caveater will have notice of every proceeding, and yet not be bound by voluntary submission to the Master. The 12th section provides for taking objections to the Master's report, and contains the following important paragraph, "that proceedings shall not abate, nor be suspended by any death, transmission, or change of interest, except so far as it shall be deemed necessary for carrying on of any such proceedings that any person not before the court shall have notice of, or be required to attend such proceedings." The object of this section is to dispense with the necessity for bills of revivor in case of death, and bills of supplement in case of transmission of interest, but the act leaves undefined the mode by which the proceedings are to be continued. There must be some machinery to bring such parties before the court. Let us take for example the instance of a petitioner becoming bankrupt before a report of the Master, how are the proceedings to be continued? The 32d section of the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 55, s. 32, familiarly known as the sheriff's act, directed that no proceeding in the matter of any petition (under which a receiver had been appointed) should determine by the death of any of the parties in such matter, but that the court might make an order for continuing such proceedings; and, in such cases where the respondent, the judgment debtor—who is not mere tenant for life, in which instance the court stands neuter, and allows the remainderman to enter without an order discharging the receiver—dies, it becomes necessary to obtain an order of the court to continue the proceedings, by serving his executor and heir at law, Brady v. Fitzgibbon, (7 I. E. R. 1); Cloncurry v. Pierr, (9 I. E. R. 407); but in proceedings under the act, the subject of our consideration, a mere order or notice will not be sufficient, there must in most cases be some pleading to bring the new parties properly before the court, either in the shape of a supplemental or amended petition; and, until this proceeding take place, we do not well understand how the petition can be proceeded with. We presume some provision will be made for all cases of abatement by the general orders, for the 13th section, which gives the court power to make an order on the application of any person interested in carrying on the proceedings—though analogous to the provision we have cited from the 5 & 6 W. 4—does not remove the difficulty in practice, more especially where the abatement is occasioned by the death of the petitioner, and it is the interest of the opposite parties that the proceedings should be dismissed.

The 14th and 15th sections regulate the number and nature of advertisements, and guard against the proceedings being vitiated by any error in any advertisement, except the court shall so direct.

The 16th is an important section. It provides that the Master, before proceeding with the inquiries directed by any reference, and from time to time, under such reference, shall cause notice to be given to all persons who shall appear to him to have any interest in any of the subjects of inquiry; and, that all notices may be served out of the jurisdiction of the court, and that the court may have the power to direct substitution of service, and further, that the court, in the case of any person who shall be served and shall not appear, may, by motion of course, make an order that such incumbrancer or person shall be bound by the proceedings as if he had been a party thereto, provided that he shall not be excluded from sharing in the proceeds of the sale.

We can hardly forbear a murmur of regret, when we reflect upon the numerous motions of course which thus will be lost to the Junior bar and their heirs for ever by this section; and we certainly claim credit for our disinterestedness in praising this measure. We had seen with comparative composure, the extinction of bills, and friendly answers, but it requires the full exercise of our patriotism and philosophy to see "motions of course" swept away; they were associated, in our mind, with no trouble, on the contrary, they are dear to most of our early bar recollections, as connected with our first rising at the Rolls, they were provocative of the first sounds our legal lips were heard to utter, they are entwined with the memory of our first fees, as the friendly solicitor puts the guinea and the brief into our hand. "Motion to serve party out of jurisdiction, suit relating to lands."

Supremam lachrymam da, memoremque mei.

It will be seen, this section gives extensive powers to the Master, and transfers almost the entire conduct of the proceedings under this act to his office; under the old system, and the 115th general order, we believe it was the practice of the Masters to serve motions on parties in cause or matter out of the jurisdiction, but in those instances, the parties were previously before the court; the 10th and 16th sections of the late act for the first time gives them power to have notices served in any part of the world, on persons not previously before the court. We presume the general orders will direct in ordinary cases who are to be served, for example, where the father tenant for life files the petition, the first tenant in tail being an infant, some one in his behalf should have notice and be his guardian, ad litem, the 35th section applies, only to sales out of court, in which case the father is empowered to apply to the court, which may direct notice to be served on some person to act for the infant, but no provision is made for sales under the order of the court, except that by the 64th section, the court is empowered to, in certain cases, appoint a guardian for an infant, for the purpose of any proceeding under the act.

The 21st section involves a new and rather dangerous principle, that when any incumbrance shall be subject to any limitations of estate or interest, or shall be held upon any trusts, the first person entitled to the income of such incumbrance, or the trustee, or other person whom the court may think fit, shall be the person to make any application, or give any consent under this act in respect of such incumbrance. In the case of consents, unless the court impose some strong checks upon the tenant for life, the interests of those in remainder, where an incumbrance is the subject of settlements are not sufficiently protected.

We have in a former article expressed our approval of the 22nd section, which enables persons entitled to unredeemable charges, to accept a gross sum, by way of compensation, and enables the Master to sell the lands discharged of those charges, or, with the consent of parties interested in part not desired to be sold, to approve of that part being exclusively charged with such incumbrance in exoneration of the rest, or, with such consent as aforesaid, to approve of such incumbrance being apportioned between sold and unsold portions, and either of these latter measures the Master is empowered to take without the consent of the party entitled to the unredeemable charge. This section also gives power to the court, on special application, to direct a sale before all the accounts are taken, or incumbrances ascertained.

The 23rd section, regulates the manner of filing reports and other proceedings, and limits the time for taking objections to the former, and enacts that the court may upon the application of any person interested, and without the attendance of counsel, unless the court shall see fit to direct such attendance, confirm the report and direct a sale. Mr. Smythe remarks justly, that "the latter part of this section exhibits a want of meaning and jealousy of lawyers equally worthy of a lack learning parliament." The order of the court must be made on application, if by petition, that proceeding will be more expensive than by motion made by counsel. Either the report should stand confirmed without further order, or if application be necessary, as the act has made it, such application should be made by counsel, who stand, as it were, between the court and the suitor. They possess the confidence of the former, and are entrusted with the interest of the latter. Thus public business can be despatched with speed and safety; the judge, relying on the statement of counsel, can dispose of fifty reports in a day, whereas if he be obliged to make flats on the several petitions, and read the reports of the Master, there will be an enormously increased amount of labour unnecessarily thrown upon him, and without any saving to the suitor.

The 27th section demands our most anxious consideration. It enacts that the form of assurance shall be such as the Master shall direct—whose execution alone shall be necessary for its validity—and directs that it shall be effectual to pass the land thereby expressed to be conveyed discharged from all former and other estates, rights, titles, charges, and incumbrances whatsoever, of her Majesty her heirs and successors, and of all other persons whomsoever. The exceptions are: the rights of any lessee, tenant, or occupier in possession, and the rights of any lessee, or under-lessee at a rent, to whose lease or under-lease the incumbrance or owner was subject—right of common—right of way, or other easement—rent-charge—crown rent and quit rent.

Does, then, the court of Chancery warrant title? Has the purchaser nothing more to do than pay his money and get the Master's signature to the deed of conveyance? Has the transfer of real estate become so simplified that no abstract and no searches will be required by a purchaser?

These are grave questions.

Mr. Smythe is of opinion, and we concur with him, that the saving "of the rights of any lessee or under-lessee subject to whose lease or under-lease the petitioning owner or incumbrancer shall be an owner or incumbrancer," will render abstracts of title and registry searches necessary, because the purchaser must know, and can only know by a registry search, what leases are in existence; and from this follows, as a necessary corollary, that he must know who were the lessors, and their title to make leases. The main question, however, still remains as to title and incumbrances; must the former be deduced, or the latter be shewn to be discharged? or can the purchaser, with the assurance under the act, executed by the Master, and without another document, acquire an indefeasible estate against the whole world? Can he rely upon this charter deed for all purposes whatsoever, both of attack and defence? With this single weapon can he maintain or defend an ejectment, and will the court of Chancery relieve him even from the necessity of seeing that the proceedings under the act are regular? If this statute will do this, every lawyer will concede that it has effected the greatest revolution in the law of real property of modern times.

A new terminus, from which titles to the lands of this country can start, will be established without a clog, without a speck; and the title to ten thousand a year may be comprised in a deed not a skin of parchment long.

We feel this to be a question of extreme difficulty, and whether our opinion arises from caution, or that the change comes upon us in too startling a shape, we know not, but we incline to think that the court does not warrant title.

The act nowhere expressly exempts a purchaser from seeing to the regularity of the proceedings; and, if he is obliged to do that—as he would be, under the present system of judicial sales—he must have an abstract, and must see that every one having a claim is bound. Yet, though the court does not warrant title, it confers one that will be good against the world, provided the requisitions of the act have been complied with, but it throws the burden of inquiry upon the buyer.

We have dwelt—with perhaps too tedious minuteness—upon the sections of the act which relate to sales under the order of the court of Chancery; we have done so because we believe that this portion of it only will come into practical operation. We view the measure through neither an exaggerated nor a diminished medium. The legislature has done much; it has lessened the expense of judicial sales, and given an owner of a limited estate the power to procure them; but a great deal of the utility and efficiency of the statute will depend on the General Orders, which both professions are expecting with anxiety.

12. That every person who, after the day named in such last-mentioned notice shall knowingly have in his possession any arms or ammunition, contrary to this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.

13. That from the day named in any such notice the Lord Lieutenant may by warrant direct a search to be made in any county, &c. named in any such notice or in any house or place within the same at any time whilst such proclamation shall be in force, for any arms or ammunition which any person shall have contrary to this act; and all arms and ammunition found, shall be forfeited for the use of Her Majesty.

14. That any county or sub-inspector to whom any such warrant shall be directed, and all constables, &c. acting in their aid may within twenty-one days after the date of such warrant, including the day of the date thereof, enter into any house or place at any time between sunrise and sunset, to execute such warrant and in case admittance be refused or shall not be obtained within a reasonable time after demanded, enter by force into such house or place to execute such warrant.

15. That the Lord Lieutenant may appoint persons to grant, at their discretion, &c. licences in the form (A.) in the schedule to this act contained, to any persons to have in his own dwelling house only or licences in the form (B.) in the schedule to this act contained to carry and have within the district named in any such, &c. or ammunition; provided that the said Lord Lieutenant, by order, may at any time revoke any licence and after the publication of such order in the "Dublin Gazette" the Licence therein mentioned shall cease and a copy of every such order shall, within four days after the making thereof, be delivered to or left at the place of abode of every person whose licence shall be revoked thereby.

16. That from the day named in any such proclamation, if there shall be any murder or any attempt to murder, or if any justice of the peace or any constable or peace officer shall have reasonable ground for believing that any murder has been committed, or any attempt to commit murder, in any county, &c. named in any such proclamation, any justice of the peace, constable, &c. may give notice to any male person between the ages of sixteen and sixty, residing or being within such county, &c. that search and pursuit is to be made to apprehend the offenders and may call upon, and thereupon it shall be the duty of every such person to join in such search and pursuit, and to assist in apprehending such offender; and every such person refusing, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be liable to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.

17. That whilst any Proclamation shall be in force, and upon any trial or proceeding under the said last-recited Acts or this Act, it shall not be necessary to prove that the district in which any offence against the said last-recited Acts, or this Act, was committed, was at the time of commission thereof in a state of general disturbance or insurrectionary movement, or that any such offence or the circumstances attending the same, was of an insurrectionary character.

18. And from the day named in any such Proclamation every accessory after the fact to any murder or attempt to murder in any proclaimed district, may be indicted and convicted together with, or after the principal offender, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal offender shall or not have been previously convicted, or shall or not be amenable to justice, and may, howsoever indicted, be punished in the same manner as any accessory after the fact to the same offence may be punished: provided that no such person who shall be once duly tried, as an accessory after the fact or for a substantive felony, shall be again tried for the same offence.

19. That from the day named in and during all the time any such proclamation shall be in force, the Lord Lieutenant may direct that any person imprisoned in any gaol, &c. in any district proclaimed, under sentence of transportation or imprisonment, may be removed to such other gaol, &c. in Ireland as to the said Lord Lieutenant shall seem fit, to remain till he be transported, or shall have served the term of imprisonment, or be otherwise discharged by due course of law; and every person so removed, shall be considered in the proper legal custody during the time of such removal, and while in the place to which he shall be so removed, in like manner if he had continued in his original place of confinement; and the maintenance of such prisoners in the place to which they shall be so removed shall be paid by the county from which they shall be so removed, as same were paid before such removal; and the expenses of such removal shall be charged on the county, &c. from which such persons shall have been removed, and shall be paid for as provided by 1 and 2 Vict. c. 6.

20. That any person prosecuted by indictment for any offence against this Act committed within such proclaimed district shall plead to such indictment, and the trial shall proceed, at any special commission, assizes, or sessions of the peace for the county wherein such offence shall have been committed next after such person shall have been committed for trial or held to bail, or if such offence be committed after the commencement of such special commission, assizes, &c., then at the same special commission, assizes, &c., unless the court shall otherwise direct.

21. That the production of the "Dublin Gazette," purporting to be printed by the Queen's printers, containing the publication of any proclamation, warrant, or notice under this act, shall be conclusive evidence, in all courts of justice in Ireland, of all facts necessary to authorize the issuing of any such proclamation, warrant, order, or notice; and every such proclamation, &c., shall be deemed to have been issued in conformity with this act.

22. That this act shall be in force until the thirty-first day of December one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and from thence until the end of the then next session of parliament.

23. That this Act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

CAP. III.

An act to give further time for making certain railways.
[20th December, 1847.]

- Sec. 1. Railway Companies may apply to Commissioners of Railways for extension of time for purchase of lands, &c.
2. Commissioners may require Company to give notice of application by advertisement in the Gazette.
3. Commissioners of railways, by warrant under their seal, may, upon proof that notice has been given, enlarge the time for the completion of purchases and works.
4. Acts mentioned or referred to in such warrants to be construed with reference to the same.
5. Not to revive expired powers. Existing contracts and notices to take lands to be construed as if this Act had not passed.
6. Notices of warrants being granted to be published in the Gazette.
7. Parties aggrieved by extension of time being granted may have compensation for additional damage.
8. Contracts for new works not to be entered into for a limited period, except in certain cases.
9. Mode of ascertaining consent of Shareholders to the making of contracts for new works.
10. Certificate of the Chairman of Company, countersigned by the Secretary, to be evidence of consent.
11. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas acts of parliament have been passed for making railways, and in them periods of time are limited within which only the powers granted for making the railways, or for the compulsory purchase of the lands re-referred to, can be lawfully exercised. And whereas it is expedient that in certain cases further time be granted for the purposes aforesaid; that if any railway company, or person authorised by any act, to construct a railway, &c. or to purchase lands for such purpose, may, at any time within two months after the passing of this act, make application, in writing, to the commissioners of railways, setting forth what extension of time is desired, and to what part of the railway, or the works or lands connected therewith, the same is to apply, and the grounds of such application.

2. That if it appear to the said commissioners that there are sufficient grounds for such application, they shall require the company, or person making the same, to give notice of such application having been made, by advertisement, in form approved of by the said commissioners, once in the London, Edinburgh, or Dublin Gazette, accordingly as such railway or works or lands are in England, Scotland, or Ireland, and once in each of three successive weeks in some newspaper published or circulating in each county in which any part of such railway or works or lands is situated, and affixed for three successive Sundays on the principal outer door of the church of every parish in which same is situated; and such notice shall set forth within what time and in what manner any person aggrieved by any such extension of time, and who desires to object, may bring such objections before the commissioners.

3. That upon proof that such notice has been duly given, and after the time appointed for bringing objections before the commissioners, and after considering same, if any brought before them, the commissioners may, by warrant under their seal, and signed by two or more of them, extend the period allowed by any act, for the completion of such railway or works, or for the compulsory purchase of lands for such further time as they think fit, not exceeding two years from the periods allowed by such act, either as to the whole of such railway or works, and the lands required for same, or as to so much as shall be specified thereof in such warrant.

4. That when any warrant is granted by the commissioners, the act authorising the construction of the railway, &c. referred to, shall be construed as if the extended period had been the period within which the powers of such act might be exercised, for the construction of such railway, &c., instead of the periods mentioned in such act.

5. That this act shall not revive powers expired before such application, and shall not affect any contract or agreement entered into before the passing of this act; and this act, or any warrant thereunder, shall not authorise any extension of the time allowed for the purchase of the lands comprised or mentioned in such contract or notice; and same shall be construed and take effect as if this act had not passed.

6. That within one month after the day any warrant is granted by the said commissioners, they shall cause notice thereof to be inserted in the London, Edinburgh, or Dublin Gazette, accordingly as the railway, &c. mentioned therein, is in England, Scotland, or Ireland.

7. That whenever any such warrant shall have been granted by the justices, arbitrators, &c. who under the provisions of such act shall award the compensation to be made to the owners or occupiers, &c. of lands taken for the purposes of such railway, shall make compensation for the additional damage (if any) sustained by such extension of time.

8. That no railway company who had not before the 27th November, 1847, executed or entered into any contract for the execution of any part of the works authorized by the act of such company, shall within twelve months after the passing of this act enter into any contract for the execution of any works for the first time authorized by such Act, except contracts for the construction of part of any railway substituted by way of deviation, or in lieu of other works authorized by some previous Act, and also contracts for the construction of such works as shall be authorized by consent of the holders of three-fifths of the shares of such company, signified within the time and in the manner hereinafter mentioned, or authorized by an order of the Commissioners of railways published in the London, Edinburgh, or Dublin

Gazette, according as the works are situated in England, Scotland, or Ireland; and all contracts entered into in contravention of this enactment shall be void.

9. That to ascertain such consent, a general meeting of the shareholders of such company shall be held within six weeks after the passing of this Act, of which notice shall be given as adopted for advertising the extraordinary general meetings of such company; and a circular letter shall be sent by post to each of the shareholders to his known address, describing the portion or line of works proposed to be executed, and stating that a meeting of the shareholders will be held as mentioned in such circular, to determine whether a contract for executing such works shall be entered into within the twelve months next after the passing of this Act, and requesting such shareholder to signify his assent or dissent from same, according to a form contained in such letter, to the effect set forth in the schedule hereto; and shall request such shareholder to return such form, signed or to attend such meeting and deliver same to the chairman; and at the meeting the chairman shall cast up the number of shares held by shareholders assenting to such contract, and dissenting therefrom, and shall publicly announce the number of shares of the shareholders assenting to such contract, and those dissenting, and state whether the holders of three-fifths of such shares consent to such contract; and in computing the number of shares of shareholders assenting or dissenting no share shall be taken into account the holder whereof shall not have paid all the calls then due upon the shares held by him.

10. That a certificate under the hand of the chairman, and countersigned by the secretary of the company, stating that such meeting has been duly held, and such letter sent, and such consent given, shall, within one week after such meeting, be deposited in the office of the Commissioners of Railways; and such certificate, or a copy thereof, certified under the seal of the Commissioners shall be evidence in all courts, and before all justices and others, that such consent was duly given within the time aforesaid.

11. And be it enacted, that this Act may be amended or repealed by any Act to be passed in this session of Parliament.

SCHEDULE referred to by the foregoing Act.

(1) Name of Railway.	(1) Name of Shareholder.	(1) No. of Shares or Amount of Stock held by him.	(1) Works pro- posed to be constructed for.	(2) Whether assenting or dissenting.

(1) The Secretary will insert these particulars.
(2) In this column the Shareholder will write the word "assenting" or "dissenting," as the case may be, and sign his name thereunder.

CAP. IV.

An act to apply the sum of eight millions out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight.

[7th March, 1848.]

CAP. V.

An act to suspend for five years the operation of certain parts of an act of the tenth year of her present Majesty, for making further provision for the government of the New Zealand Islands; and to make other provision in lieu thereof.

[7th March, 1848.]

CAP. VI.

An act to make further provision for one year, and to the end of the then next session of Parliament, for the carriage of passengers by sea to North America.

[28th March, 1848.]

1. No ship carrying passengers allowed to take more than a limited number, according to space and tonnage.
2. Two children under a certain age to be computed as one passenger.
3. No ship carrying a certain number of passengers to proceed on her voyage without a ship's cook.

4. Ships carrying passengers to have a duly qualified surgeon on board, the number to be limited.
5. When limited, how children to be calculated.
6. Qualification of Surgeon.
7. No ship to proceed, until the Medicine Chest and Passengers have been inspected by a Medical Practitioner. Remuneration of medical practitioner. If no medical practitioner can be obtained, ship may proceed by permission of emigration officer.
8. Passengers affected with diseases may be re-landed. Penalty on Master wilfully proceeding on voyage with diseased persons on board.
9. Passengers so re-landed entitled to recover passage money by summary process before two justices.
10. Her Majesty may issue orders in council prescribing rules, &c. for preserving order, &c. on board vessels. Evidence of orders, &c.
11. Surgeon or Master to exact obedience to rules and regulations.
12. Penalty for refusing to observe rules and regulations.
13. Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners to prepare an abstract of acts and orders in council. Such abstract to be posted up in each ship. Penalty on Master for neglect; and on person defacing abstract.
14. How penalties to be recovered.
15. Bond required by first recited act to be security for observance of provisions of secondly recited act and this act.
16. Duties of Emigration officer may be performed by his assistant.
17. Interpretation of act.
18. Exemption of ships carrying less than one passenger to 25 tons. In certain actions as to ships carrying passengers, burden of proof to lie on defendant.
19. Short title of act.
20. Continuance of act.
21. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas it is expedient to alter certain provisions of the 5 & 6 Vic. c. 107, intituled An Act for regulating the Carriage of Passengers in Merchant Vessels, and of 10 & 11 Vic. c. 103, intituled An Act to amend the Passengers Act, and to make further provision for the Carriage of Passengers by Sea: Be it therefore enacted, That no ship carrying passengers from any place in the United Kingdom, or in the Islands of Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, or Man, to any place on the Eastern Coast of North America, or in the islands adjacent, or in the Gulf of Mexico, shall carry more passengers than in the proportion of one passenger to every two tons of the registered tonnage of such ship; and that no such ship shall carry more passengers on board than one passenger for every twelve clear superficial feet, or on the orlop deck, one passenger for every thirty superficial feet; and if any ship shall carry any person beyond such proportions, the master of the ship shall, in respect of every person constituting such excess, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds sterling.

2. That in computing the proportions, two children, under the age of fourteen years, shall be computed as one person, and children under the age of one year shall not be included.

3. That no ship carrying one hundred passengers, shall proceed on her voyage without a cook approved by the emigration officer at the port of clearance, nor unless a convenient place shall have been set apart, and apparatus provided for cooking to the satisfaction of the said officer: and if any ship shall proceed on her voyage without same, the master shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.

4. That any such ship shall have on board a surgeon duly qualified, or such ship shall not carry more passengers on the deck upon which the passengers live than in the proportion of one passenger to every fourteen superficial feet.

5. That in the calculation of such proportion every child above the age of one year shall be computed as one passenger.

6. That every such surgeon shall be duly qualified to practice in the United Kingdom as physician, surgeon or apothecary, and not to be objected to by the said emigration officer.

7. That, except as hereinafter provided, no ship shall proceed on any such voyage, until the surgeon or some medical practitioner, appointed by the said emigration officer, shall have inspected the medicine chest of the ship, and the passengers, and shall certify to the said officer that the ship contains a sufficient supply of medicines, instruments, and other things requisite for the medical treatment of the passengers during the voyage, and that none of the passengers appear likely, by reason of any disease, to endanger the health of the persons on board: provided that the master, owner, &c. of every ship so inspected shall pay to such practitioner a sum not exceeding twenty shillings for every hundred passengers: provided that in case it shall be impossible to obtain the attendance of such medical practitioner, the master may proceed, on receiving from the said officer written permission.

8. That in case any such surgeon or medical Practitioner shall notify to the Emigration officer at the original port of Clearance, or any other port in the United Kingdom into which the vessel may subsequently put, or in case the said officer shall be otherwise satisfied, that any person likely to endanger the health of the other persons on board, such officer may re-land such person, and his family, and the Master who shall wilfully proceed with any such person on board shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.

9. That any person so re-landed, or the emigration officer on his behalf may recover by process, before two Justices of the peace, as in the said first-recited act is provided in the cases of monies thereby made recoverable, the whole of the monies which shall have been paid by him or them, or on his or their account, for his or their passage in such ship, from the party to whom the same may have been paid, or from the owner, Charterer, or Master of such ship.

10. That Her Majesty, by any order or orders in council may prescribe such rules and regulations as may seem fit for preserving order, and for securing cleanliness and ventilation, on board British ships proceeding on such voyage, and the said rules and regulations in like manner may alter, amend, and revoke; and that such order in council in the London Gazette, or printed by the Queen's printer, shall be received in all legal proceedings as sufficient evidence of the making and contents of such order.

11. That in every British ship the surgeon, or in ships not having a surgeon on board, the master may exact obedience to all such rules and regulations as aforesaid; under the penalties herein-after provided.

12. That any person who shall neglect or refuse to obey any such rule or regulation, or who shall obstruct the Master or surgeon of such ship in the execution of any duty imposed upon him by such rule or regulation, shall pay a penalty not exceeding two pounds sterling; and the Justices of the peace in any part of her majesty's dominions, before whom any person shall be convicted of such obstruction or resistance as aforesaid, may order such person, in addition to the penalty before mentioned, to be confined for any period not exceeding one month.

13. That the said Colonial Land and Emigration commissioners shall prepare an abstract of the whole or part of this and of the recited acts, and of any order in council made as aforesaid; and that six copies of the abstract, with two copies of this and of the said acts, shall be delivered by the Collector or Comptroller of the Customs of the port of Clearance to the master of every ship carrying passengers on such voyage; and that such master shall, so long as any passenger be entitled to remain in the ship, keep posted, in two places between the decks of the said ship, copies of such abstract, and shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings sterling for every day such abstract shall fail to be so posted; and any person defacing such abstract shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings sterling.

14. That penalties imposed by this act shall be recovered in such manner, as in the said first-recited act.

15. That the bond required by the said first-recited act, to be given to Her Majesty in respect of ships carrying more than fifty passengers shall be a security, not only for the matters and payments in the said act, but also for the observance of the provisions as well of the said secondly-recited act, as of this act, and of any regulations prescribed by any order in council, and for the due payment by the Master of such vessel of all penalties adjudged by virtue of the said secondly-recited act, or of this act.

16. That all powers and duties imposed upon the Emigration officer before mentioned, may be performed by his assistant, or, at ports where there shall be no such officer, by the officer of the Customs whose duty it may be to grant a clearance to such ship.

17. That term "passenger" shall not include passengers commonly known by the name of cabin passengers; and the term "ship" shall include every sea-going vessel; and the term "Master" shall include any person being in command of such vessel; and that, unless there be something in the subject matter, or context repugnant to such construction, every word importing the singular number, or the masculine gender only shall be construed to include several persons, matters, or things, as well as one person, matter, or thing, and females as well as males.

18. Provided always, that nothing in this act shall apply to any ship in which the number of passengers shall not bear to the registered tonnage a greater proportion than one to every twenty-five tons: provided also, that if in any action, prosecution, or other legal proceeding under this act, any question shall arise whether any ship carrying passengers, did or did not carry a greater number of passengers than aforesaid in proportion to the tonnage, the burden of proving that the number of passengers in proportion to the tonnage was not greater than that of one person to every twenty-five tons shall lie upon the person against whom any such action, prosecution, or other legal proceeding may be brought; and, failing such proof, it shall, for any such purpose as aforesaid, be taken and adjudged that the number of passengers so carried did exceed that proportion.

19. That in all proceedings it shall be sufficient to cite this act by the title of "The North American passengers Act."

20. That this act shall remain in force for one year from the passing, and from thence to the end of the then next session of Parliament.

21. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

IN CHANCERY.

John Squire and others, Plaintiffs, vs. Charles Blake & others, Defendants. Pursuant to the decree in this cause, bearing date the 3rd day of July, 1848, I hereby require all persons having charges and incumbrances affecting the estate of the defendant, Charles Blake, situate in the counties of Mayo and Galway, and county of the town of Galway, in the pleadings in this cause mentioned, to come in before me, at my chambers on the Inn's Quay, in the city of Dublin, on or before Thursday, the 1st day of February next, and prove the same, otherwise they will be precluded from the benefit of the said decree.—Dated this 1st day of November, 1848.

EDWARD LAYTON, Dwyer and McKay, Plaintiffs' Solicitors, 5, Kildare-street, Dublin.

THE WINTER PALEOT, TWO POUNDS.

This may truly be denominated both a handsome and "useful coat." It is neat in appearance, excellent in quality, durable in wear. It is really a gentleman's coat, well cut, nothing ostentatious, particularly becoming and unassuming in appearance. It can be had of all substances, from a light flannel walking coat to a milled black cloth for sharp weather, and the Tiverton Bearer or Pilot for a very cold day, or for car or gig use. For professional men I particularly recommend the black or Oxford cloth, either of the medium or milled substance.

They can either be made to order, or selected from THE READY-MADE DEPARTMENT, where there are many hundreds, in all varieties and sizes, warranted as well made as if ordered.

"Mr. Kelly, College-green."

TROWERS.—The numerous testimonials received by JAMES O'DRISCOLL in approval of the elegance, ease, and peculiar style of his Trowers, and likewise the very flattering patronage bestowed on him by the higher classes of society, induces him to apprise his patrons, and those gentlemen who have not hitherto honored him with their orders, that he has secured the services of a few of the most experienced Parisian workmen for the winter season. J. O'D's practical knowledge as a Trowers Cutter having been fully tested in the first houses of the British metropolis, he is therefore fully qualified to produce an article in this department of Tailoring, that cannot be excelled in London or Paris.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER 25, 1848.

THE cases of Boddington and Langford, and Kelly and Bonyag, (1 Ir. Jur. 3,) lay down the principle broadly, that, under no circumstances whatsoever, can a receiver purchase an interest, present or future, vested or contingent, in the estate over which he has been appointed. And if the former case—which goes further than any ever yet reported—be law, his purchase will be set aside at the instance of a creditor not a party in the suit at the time the purchase was made.

The principle could not by possibility be tested more favourably for the purchasers than in the cases cited, for in both there was neither fraud, suppression, nor concealment. Vendor and vendee dealt at arm's length; there was no evidence of undervalue, they were simply instances of bargains, which, on the doctrine of chances, might or might not turn out to be good.

Boddington v. Langford has not been reported, but we are enabled to give the facts correctly.

The property of the late Lord Langford, being the subject of several Chancery suits, and much embarrassed; shortly after his death Lady Langford—who derived no income from her jointure, the rents of the estate being absorbed in the payment of the interest of prior incumbrances—sold it, and the arrears of an annuity to which she was entitled, during the life of her husband, to the receiver for an annuity, payable quarterly, with a condition that if any gale were unpaid thirty days after the appointed time, she should have the power to rescind the sale, and resume her original rights against the estate. There was no proof, that, at the time of the purchase Mr. Boddington—an incumbrancer puisne to the jointure—was a party in any one of the causes in which the receiver had been appointed. In the year 1840 the bill was filed by Boddington, and subsequently revived by his executors, for a general administration of Lord Lang-ford's real and personal estate, and prayed that the receiver might only be declared entitled to such sums as he had actually advanced. The fairness of the transaction was never questioned. When the cause came to a hearing, the Chancellor, Sir Edward Sugden, felt the difficulty of making a decree at the instance of a third party, and the cause stood over to give Lady Langford the option of setting aside the purchase, if so advised; this she declined to do—an excellent test of her being satisfied with her contract—and in the following term the purchase was set aside, the plaintiff undertaking to take the place of the receiver in paying Lady Langford, and to indemnify him against any demand by her, and of course on the further terms of the receiver being paid the amount actually advanced by him.

The estates have not yet been sold, nor has one shilling ever been received out of the rents in respect of the jointure.

Thus, if ever there was a case in which more than justice was done to the creditor, and less than justice to the receiver, it was that which we have stated; and, if that decision be followed, it is not possible to conceive any instance in which a purchase by a receiver can stand; and the rule will be inflexibly established, with even more strictness than that which exists between trustee and cestui que trust, for though the rule is absolute whilst that relationship subsists, yet it is open to the cestui que trust, and to him only, to set aside a purchase by the trustee. In the case under consideration, Lady Langford did not seek relief, nor did the inheritor, but it was granted to a third party, between whom and the receiver no fiduciary character existed, and who thus acquired an advantage for which he never contracted, inasmuch as he lent his money subject to the jointure. Its being extinguished, and the value of the estate thereby enhanced, was an accident which could never have been matter of his legitimate calculation. In every previous case that we have met, such purchases have been set aside at the instance of those with whom the confidential character had been created, or who had a direct interest in the subject matter of sale. For example, where creditors had a lien upon the subject of sale, here there was none; there they were to be paid out of the fund to be realized by the estate on which they were incumbrancers, the value of which was undetermined, and might fluctuate according to the efforts made to depreciate it, here into whosoever hands the jointure passed, the value of the estate on which it was charged remained unaltered.

Kelly and Bonyng stands on plainer, and, to our judgment, on more solid grounds; there the application was made by the inheritor, and it is quite right that if an agent during his employment—and, as must be presumed from the facilities afforded by his office—makes a beneficial purchase, the benefit ought to redound to the principal. Whether the purchase be of a vested or contingent, present or remote interest, and even though the receiver runs all the risk, and the moment the speculation turns out to be profitable—as in the case of a reversionary interest, which, by death, soon falls into possession—the principal demands and procures the benefit.

We may, however, conclude that the later authorities have now established that a receiver, as a public officer, as well as on other grounds, is disqualified, without leave of the court, from buying any interest in the property over which he has been appointed, and that this rule scarcely admits of an exception. The purchase can always be set aside on the terms of repaying the amount advanced with interest, provided the application be made in time. And this principle applies to purchases by solicitors, agents, or counsel, so long as the relation subsists, whether the purchase be either of incumbrances affecting the estate of their employer, or of the estate itself, the client not being the vendor. Austin v. Chambers, (6 Cl. & Fin. 1); Carter & Palmer, (8 Ib. 657). In either of the instances put they might enter into competition with the owner; but it is not a little singular that a counsel or solicitor is not debarred from dealing directly with a client, even whilst the connection subsists. Purchases in all such cases are looked upon with the utmost jealousy, and, if there be a tinge of fraud, will be set aside; but they are not as strongly prohibited as in the case of trustee and cestui que trust. Champion v. Rigby, (9 Law Journal, N. S. 211, Ch.) There is no incapacity to contract, but the rule, as stated by Sir E. Sugden, is, that the "relation must be in some way dissolved, or, if not, the parties must be put so much at arm's length that they agree to take the character of purchaser and vendor, and you must examine whether all the duties of those characters have been performed." The result being that you can purchase an estate from a client, but you cannot purchase the estate of a client who is not the vendor.

We have been favoured by Mr. Napier with a copy of his judgment in the case of Pilsworth v. Grand Canal Company, and it contains an elaborate disquisition on an important branch of the law, we give it to our readers.

In this case I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation from the defendants, for the damage sustained by the sinking of his boat in the Canal Harbour of Moyvalley. The material facts of the case, as I understand them, and as I consider them established on the evidence, are these. On the night in question the plaintiff's boat had arrived at the harbour of Moyvalley, shortly before the arrival of the packet boat; and after touching at the Moyvalley side, so as to give facility to one of the persons on board to hand out oats for the purpose of feeding the horses engaged in drawing the boat, the persons on board pushed the boat with poles across towards the opposite side of the canal, within a few yards of another boat, which was moored close to the opposite bank, in which position the plaintiff's boat was, when the packet boat entered the harbour or station. It appears that the plaintiff's boat had no light, nor was there a horn on board, which might have been sounded. Between the plaintiff's boat and the Moyvalley side of the harbour, an open space of nearly 30 feet was left—the whole breadth at this place being about 67 feet; the packet boat was making for the centre of the arch of the bridge below Moyvalley, and so was moving nearly in the middle of the canal. The night appears to have been dark or foggy, and the packet boat had approached very close to the plaintiff's boat, before the latter was observed; the driver of the horses of the packet boat first observed the boat of the plaintiff, and called out "mind your hand," which, it appears, is the customary signal when any boat is seen in advance at night, and is a notification to the steersman of the packet boat that the course of the packet boat is to be changed. About the same time it would appear the captain of the packet boat called out to the steersman "starboard," which order it was his duty to obey; but the steersman being at the time on the starboard side of the tiller, put the helm the opposite way, by which the course of the packet boat, instead of being averted from, was directed towards the plaintiff's boat; a collision took place, and the plaintiff's boat went down. According to strict propriety, the plaintiff's boat should either have been moored close at the opposite bank, or at least provided with a light, and a horn to sound; and the packet boat should have kept near to the track line bank, that side being the proper side for the packet to stop at, or to pass along, in the event of overtaking any other boat on the canal.

The strict rule seems to have been frequently departed from, as well by the packet boat as by carrier boats; and on the occasion in question it seems to me that both boats were out of place, and neither properly managed; for the plaintiff's boat should (if not moored) have been provided with a light and horn, and the packet boat, on entering the harbour, should have kept near to the bank on the Moyvalley side, and the person at the helm should have been ready to obey, and have promptly obeyed any order of the captain. The disobedience of the order given by the captain was a breach of duty, and it was plainly so considered by the captain, as well as by the defendants, who have since dismissed the steersman. I, therefore, think the liability of the defendants for the loss occasioned by the breach of duty on the part of their servant, has been established, unless it can be successfully contended that the plaintiff has disentitled himself to recover, by reason of his servants having improperly had his boat in the centre of the canal, without light or horn, and so contributed to the consequence which has resulted from the collision.

It is to be observed that the injury is not the result of any act of the plaintiff or his servants immediately producing it, but, on the contrary, the act of the servant of the defendants has directly occasioned the collision. And this is important to notice, because I think that it will be found, on examining the decisions on the subject, that the onus is cast on the party by whose act the loss directly happens, to establish satisfactorily that the damage so occasioned by his act, could not, by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence on his part, have been prevented. In this case, I think, the onus of proof lay on the defendants, as in the case Colleril v. Starkey, (8 Car. & P. 691); and I do not find that there is any of the servants of the Company, who were present at the time of the collision, who has ventured to depose on his oath that the collision would not have been avoided, if the captain's order had been obeyed. All, but the captain, admit, that in their opinion it would, in that case, have been avoided—the captain will not say it would not; and unless possibility is to be substituted for moral certainty, I do not see how I can decide against the claim of the plaintiff.

Upon a careful examination of the cases on this subject, it appears to me, that if from default, or want of proper care or caution, on the part of the injured party, he has substantially contributed to the immediate and proximate cause of the injury, he must be taken to be the author of his own wrong, which he shall not be allowed to apportion for his own benefit and advantage; but if his negligence or default has merely facilitated the infliction of the injury, without directly contributing to the immediate cause of it, I think it is no bar to compensation for a loss occasioned by the want of due and proper care on the part of the defendant, and which loss, in reference to its immediate and proximate cause, is to be considered as the wrong of the defendant, and not of the plaintiff. But in this latter case, the negligence or default of the injured party may perhaps be an element in considering the damages which the plaintiff may be entitled to recover.

It is not, at first sight, easy to reconcile the opinions and dicta to be found in the cases which have been cited. The case of Flower v. Adam, (2 Taunton, 314), is an authority to shew that the immediate and proximate cause of the injury is what is to be considered in fixing liability, and this case furnishes an explanation which reconciles most of the decisions on the subject. That a person sustaining injury, when on the wrong side of the road, has a right of action, is fully established by Clay v. Wood, (5 Espinasse, 44), where Lord Ellenborough held "that the circumstance of the person being on the wrong side of the road, was not sufficient to discharge the defendant; for though a person might be on his wrong side of the road, if the road was of sufficient breadth, so that there was full and ample room for the party to pass, he was of opinion he was bound to take that course which would carry him clear of the person who was on his wrong side, and that if any injury happened, by running against such person, he would be answerable."

The case of Lynch v. Durdin, (4 Perry & Davison, 672), is also a strong authority to shew that it does not necessarily constitute a defence, to establish that the plaintiff by his own improvidence or misconduct, has, to some extent, occasioned the loss of which he complains. The rule appears correctly stated by Lord Abinger, in the case of Davies v. Mann, (10 Meeson & Welsby, 548), in which a plaintiff recovered damages for an injury done to a donkey, which he had improperly left fettered on a public road, but which was run over by the defendant, from want of proper care on his part, in going along the road with a waggon. These authorities establish that it is material, first to consider the act which immediately causes the injury. If that act is the result of the defendant's want of caution, and to be attributed to his default, he is liable; but if the party injured has, by any default on his part, at the time, made himself a participator in the very act which directly causes the injury, he cannot recover; such participation, however, is distinct from, and not to be confounded with mere culpable neglect or impropriety, in being in a position which may expose the party to injury, and which may conduce to the loss he suffers, though it does not directly occasion that loss, or justify the act of the defendant, by which it is occasioned, to the extent of affording him a complete defence.

This view of the law is fully sustained by considering how the defence would be available in an action of trespass. Where a defendant pleads specially to justify the trespass, as occasioned by inevitable accident, he must shew himself to be wholly free from blame, Com. Dig. Battery A. (2 vol. Ham. Ed. 272); Wakeman v. Robinson, (8 B. Moore, 63.) But if the defence be founded on the alleged wrongful conduct of the plaintiff, I apprehend such can only be available where it has rendered the trespass unavoidable, by due and reasonable precaution on the part of the defendant, or has formed such an integral part of the injurious act, as to make it impracticable to ascribe the damage which has resulted, to the conduct of the one party more than to that of the other. The plaintiff, in such a case, as Baron Parke observes, is the author of his own wrong—at least he cannot say with certainty that he is not, but another is; and such I hold to be the true result of the several decided cases, when considered with reference to those fixed principles which are never to be merged in casual dicta arising out of peculiar facts.

Some Nisi Prius cases have been referred to, which I do not feel it incumbent to notice in detail, nor do I conceive that in any one of them, when considered in reference to its material facts, would there be found a real conflict with the conclusion at which I have arrived.

That conclusion is the result of a careful consideration of the evidence given, and a strict analysis of the decided cases, bearing on the question of liability; and although I feel a real distrust of my own opinion, when I find it opposed to the conclusion at which Mr. Fitzgibbon and Mr. Sproule have arrived, I am not the less bound to state that opinion explicitly.

I have signed the award, considering myself formally bound to act on the opinion of the majority; but the above reasons satisfied my own mind that the plaintiff had a right to recover.

N.B.—The difference between the arbitrators, was on the inference to be deduced from the evidence—namely, whether obedience to the order of the captain would have saved the collision. Mr. Sproule agreed with the view of the law which I took, but differed on the question of fact.

The case was argued before us by Mr. Henn and Mr. F. Fitzgerald.

11. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by an act passed in the 36 G. 3, c. 7. an Act for the safety and preservation of his Majesty's person and government against treasonable and seditious practices, it was enacted, that if any person, after the passing of that act, during the life of his said Majesty, and until the end of the next session of parliament after the demise of the crown, should, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend death or destruction, or any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the person of his said Majesty, or to deprive or depose him from the style, honour, or kingly name of the imperial crown of this realm or of any other of his said Majesty's dominions or countries, or to levy war against his said Majesty, within this realm, in order, by force or constraint, to compel him or them to change his measures or counsels, or in order to put any force or constraint upon or to intimidate or overawe either house of parliament, or to move or stir any foreigner or stranger with force to invade this realm or any other of his said Majesty's dominions and such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices, or intentions, or any of them, should express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing, or by any overt act or deed being convicted upon the oaths of two lawful and credible witnesses, upon trial, or otherwise convicted or attainted by due course of law, then every such person or persons so offending should be deemed, and declared to be a traitor and suffer death, and forfeit as in high treason: and whereas by and act of parliament passed in the 57 G. 3 c. 6, all the before recited provisions of the said act which relate to the heirs and successors of his said Majesty, were made perpetual: and whereas it is doubtful whether the last-recited act extended to Ireland: and it is expedient to repeal all the provisions made perpetual by the last act as do not relate to offences against the person of the Sovereign, and to enact other provisions instead applicable to all parts of the united kingdom, and to extend to Ireland such of the provisions of the said acts as are not hereby repealed; be it enacted by the Queen, &c. by and with the advice, &c. that from the passing of this act, the 36 G. 3, c. 7, made perpetual by the 57 G. 3, c. 6, and all the provisions of the last act save such of the same respectively as relate to the compassing, imagining, inventing, devising, or intending death or destruction, or any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the person of the heirs and successors of his said Majesty king George the third, and the expressing, uttering, or declaring of such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices, or intentions, or any of them, are hereby repealed.

2. That such of the said provisions made perpetual by the 57 G. 3, c. 6, as are not hereby repealed shall extend to and be in force in that part of the united kingdom called Ireland.

3. That if any person shall, within the united kingdom or without, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend to deprive or depose our most gracious lady the Queen, from the style, honour, or royal name of the imperial crown of the united kingdom, or of any of her Majesty's dominions or to levy war against her Majesty, within any part of the united kingdom, in order by force or constraint to compel her to change her measures or counsels, or in order to put any force or constraint upon or in order to intimidate either house of parliament, or to move or stir any foreigner or stranger with force to invade the united kingdom or any other her Majesty's dominions or countries, and such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices, or intentions, or any of them, shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing, or by open and advised speaking, or by any overt act or deed, every person so offending shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted shall be liable, to be transported for the term of his natural life, or for not less than seven years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

4. That no person shall be prosecuted for any felony in respect of such compassings, imaginations, inventions, devices, or intentions as far as the same are expressed, by speaking only, unless information of such compassings, &c. and of the words by which the same were expressed, uttered, or declared, shall be given upon oath to a justice of the peace, or to any sheriff or steward, or sheriff substitute or steward substitute, in Scotland, within six days after such words shall have been spoken, unless a warrant for the apprehension of the person by whom such words shall have been spoken shall be issued within ten days next after such information shall have been given, and unless such warrant shall be issued within two years next after the passing of this act; and that no person shall be convicted of any such compassings, &c. in so far as the same are expressed, uttered, or declared by open or advised speaking as aforesaid, except upon his own confession, or unless the words so spoken shall be proved by two credible witnesses.

5. That in any indictment for felony under this act, to charge against the offender any number of the matters, acts, or deeds by which such compassings, &c. or any of them, shall have been expressed, uttered, or declared.

6. That nothing herein shall lessen the force of or in any manner affect any thing enacted by the 25 Edw. 3. c. 2.

7. That if the facts or matters in an indictment for felony under this act shall amount to treason, such indictment shall not be deemed void, or defective; and if the facts or matters proved on the trial shall amount in law to treason, such person shall not be entitled to be acquitted of such felony; but no person tried for such felony shall be prosecuted for treason upon the same facts.

8. That in every felony under this act, every principal in the second degree and every accessory before the fact shall be punishable in the same manner as the principal in the first degree, and every accessory after the fact shall on conviction be liable to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two years.

9. Provided, that no person committed in Scotland for any offence under this act shall insist on liberation on bail, unless with consent of the public prosecutor, or by warrant of the high court or circuit court of judicature, in such manner and to the same effect as is provided by 5 & 6 W. 4. c. 73. An act to provide that persons accused of forgery in Scotland shall not be entitled to bail, but the trial of any person so committed, and whether liberated on bail or not, shall be proceeded with under the like certification and conditions as if intimation to fix a diet for trial had been made to the public prosecutor in terms of the Scottish act of 1701.

10. That it shall not be lawful for any court before which any person shall be prosecuted or tried for any felony under this act to order payment to the prosecutor or the witnesses of any costs which shall be incurred in preferring or prosecuting any such indictment.

11. That this act may be amended, &c.

CAP. XIII.

An Act for amending the law for the Leasing of Mines in Ireland. [22d April, 1848.]

Sec. 1. So much of the recited Acts as specifies a minimum Rent upon Leases of Mines, or limits the Term of such Leases to thirty-one years, repealed; and Leases of Mines authorized by the said Acts may be made for forty-one years, so as the best improved rent that can be reasonably gotten be reserved, &c.

2. Trustees, &c. of any Freehold Estate in Mines may make Leases for forty-one years upon like terms as herein-before provided.

3. Leases under recited Act may be surrendered, and again granted under this act.

4. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by an act passed in the 10 G. 1, c. 1, An act for the further encouragement of finding and working mines and minerals in this kingdom, it is that all archbishops and bishops, deans, deans and chapters, archdeacons, prebendaries, and other dignitaries ecclesiastical, persons, rectors, vicars, and to and for all bodies politic and corporate, colleges, cathedral or collegiate churches, and hospitals, and to and for all and every person or persons whatsoever who now are or at any time hereafter shall be tenant or tenants for life, with an immediate remainder to his or her first and every other son in tail male, and also to and for every person who now are or at any time hereafter shall be tenant in dower or by courtesy, with the consent of such person as shall be seised in reversion or remainder of an estate of inheritance in any mines immediately expectant upon the death of such tenant in dower or by the courtesy, or in case of nonage, idiocy, or the lunacy of such person so seised in reversion or remainder, then with and by the consent of the guardian of such minor, or the committee of such idiot or lunatic, by and with the approbation of the Lord Chancellor, by indentures under their respective hands and seals, may make and grant leases not exceeding the term of thirty-one years, of all mines and minerals which are already or may hereafter be found and discovered within their respective manors, glebes, or lands, so as the same be made to commence in possession, without any fine, or other consideration than the yearly rent in such lease reserved and so as the most improved rent be reserved upon every such lease, and that such rent be not less than one tenth part of the ore to be dug out of such mines, without any regard had to the expenses in digging, and laying the same on the bank, and so as such rent shall be reserved and made payable in and by such leases to such lessor or such person as should from time to time during the continuance of such lease have been entitled by the laws of this kingdom to the benefit of such mines in case this act had not been made: and whereas by 15 G. 2, (I.) An act for explaining and amending an act, intitled 'an act for the further encouragement of finding and working mines and minerals in this kingdom', the provisions of the said act 10 G. 1, were extended to coal mines: and whereas by the 23 G. 2, (I.) An act for amending an act, intitled 'an act for the further encouragement of finding and working mines and minerals within this kingdom', the said act of the 10 G. 1, extended, and the parties therein mentioned are empowered to make leases of coal mines for any term of years not exceeding forty-one in possession, and not in reversion, at any rent not less than two-pence for every ton of coals which shall be raised and laid upon the bank, without fine or other consideration than the yearly rent reserved: and whereas certain of the said acts were amended by 46 G. 3, c. 71, An act to amend several acts for the encouragement of working mines and minerals in Ireland; and it is expedient to amend the provisions of the said acts, in relation to the duration of the term and the rent to be reserved on leases therein provided for: be it enacted, that so much of the 10 G. 1, and of the said acts amending the same, as limits the term of such leases to thirty-one years, and as requires that the rent be not less than one tenth part of the ore to be dug and raised out of such mines, without regard to the expenses in digging and raising and laying the same on the bank, and so much of the 23 G. 2, or of any act amending the same, as provides that the rent reserved in any such leases of coal mines as in the said act mentioned shall not be less than two-pence for every ton of coals which shall be raised and laid upon the bank, is repealed; and it shall be lawful for every person or bodies politic or corporate, empowered to make leases by the said acts are hereby empowered, as in the said acts mentioned, to grant for any term of years not exceeding forty-one, any lease as is authorized by the said recited acts to be made for a term not exceeding thirty-one years, or any term therein mentioned, so as every such lease be made to commence in possession, without any fine or other consideration than the yearly rent or other return in the nature of rent in such lease reserved and so as the best and most improved rent, whether in money or in kind, be reserved upon such lease, and so as such rent shall be reserved and payable in and by every such lease to such lessor or such other person as should during the continuance of such lease have been entitled by law to the benefit of such mines in case the said acts and this act had not been passed, and so as in every such lease there be condition for re-entry on nonpayment of the rent to be thereby reserved, and so as every lessee do execute a counterpart of his lease; and the several provisions of the said recited acts in force, and not hereby altered or repealed, shall, be construed to extend to such leases as are hereby authorized.

2. That it shall be lawful for any trustee, or feoffee, for charitable or other purposes or feme covert or infant, any freehold estate in any such mines, or of any estate therein (other than a lease at rack rent), created for a term of years not exceeding fifty years, or determinable upon the fall of any life or lives, or upon the execution of any trusts mentioned in any deed creating such term, and also for any trustee of any such estate in the actual possession of such mines, or the rents and profits thereof, on behalf of their respective cestuique trusts or such feme covert or infant as aforesaid, to make any lease of the same, and of lands contiguous thereto, as in the said acts specified, for any term of years not exceeding forty-one years, upon like conditions as herein-before provided as to the leases hereby authorized.

3. That it shall be lawful for any of the said respective persons herein-before mentioned, to accept a surrender or surrenders of any existing lease made under the authority of the said recited acts, and to make and grant a lease of the same mines under the provisions of this act.

4. That this act may be amended or repealed in this present session of Parliament.

Sec. 1. Proceedings which under the recited Act might be done at the Spring Assizes, may be done in like manner at the Summer Assizes of this year.

2. Time for holding Presentment Sessions for the County extended.

3. As to Adjournment of Sessions held under recited Act and this Act.

4. Recited Act and this construed as one.

b. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas by an act passed in the present session to facilitate the completion, in certain cases, of public works in Ireland, returns are directed to be made at the ensuing spring assizes, and under the said act and the acts incorporated therewith certain presentments are to be made at the same assizes: And it is expedient that the time for proceedings under the said act be extended.' Be it enacted that the returns, special sessions, presentments, and proceedings which, under the said recited act, should be made, held, or taken previous to or at the spring assizes, 1848, may be made, held, and taken at the summer assizes of the same year, notwithstanding any special sessions or proceedings that may have been held or taken under the said act; and that the provisions of the said act shall apply to the said summer assizes, and to any grand jury empanelled thereat, and to the returns, presentments, &c. made thereat, or previously or subsequently thereto, as fully as to the said spring assizes, or to any Grand Jury empanelled thereat, or to the returns, presentments, matters, and things to be made or done thereat, or previously or subsequently thereto.

2. 'And whereas it is by the said act enacted, that the secretary of the Grand Jury shall, by notice convene a special sessions for the county, to be holden at the time specified in such notice, not being sooner than seven days from the time of posting, nor later than six weeks after the first special sessions shall have been held for any barony within such county under the said act; be it enacted, that such sessions for the county shall, as in the said act provided for the holding of such sessions, be convened by the secretary of the Grand Jury by notice, to be holden in the county court house, for the purposes of the said act and this act, at the time specified, not being sooner than seven days from the time of posting such notice, nor later than six weeks after the first special sessions held after the passing of this act for any barony, for the purposes of the said act and this act.

3. That any sessions holden under the said act and this act may be continued from day to day, or be adjourned, as shall be found expedient: provided, that within thirty days from the termination of such adjourned or continued sessions, the adjourned sessions for the opening of tenders and proposals, as in the said act mentioned.

4. That the said recited act and this act shall be construed together as one act.

5. That this Act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. XXIV.

An Act for disfranchising the Freemen of the Borough of Great Yarmouth. [30th June, 1848.]

CAP. XXV.

An Act to extend the powers given by former acts for purchasing or hiring Land in connexion with or for the use of Workhouses in Ireland; and for providing for the Burial of the Poor. [30th June, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Boards of Guardians may memorialize Commissioners to purchase or hire additional Land, who may with consent of Lord Lieutenant purchase or hire the same; not to exceed 25 statute acres.

2. So much of recited act 10 & 11 Vict. c. 31, as extends certain provisions as to Schools in the North and South Dublin Unions to other parts of Ireland repealed; and other provisions enacted in lieu thereof.

3. Boards of Guardians may provide coffins for burial of persons who at the time of death were receiving out-door relief.

4. Former acts and this act to be construed as one.

5. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, power was given to the poor law commissioners to purchase or hire land, not exceeding twelve acres imperial measure, for the purpose of building a workhouse thereon, or to be occupied there-with: and whereas by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 31, further power was given to purchase or hire land not exceeding

'three statute acres, in addition for the site of a fever ward, or for a cemetery, and it is desirable that the powers of the commissioners to hire or purchase land should be extended, that a greater quantity may be cultivated for the employment and instruction of children in an improved system of the cultivation of land:' be it therefore enacted, that the majority of the guardians of any union may memorialize the commissioners to hire or purchase the quantity of land necessary and the commissioners may with the approval of the Lord Lieutenant may hire or purchase the quantity of land not exceeding twenty-five statute acres in addition to the quantity heretofore authorized by law to be used solely for the purposes above stated.

2. That so much of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 31, as extends to other parts of Ireland provisions relating to the establishment of schools in the North and South Dublin Unions, and authorizes the poor law commissioners to combine unions into school districts be repealed; and the commissioners may combine any two or more Unions for the maintenance and education of children not above the age of fifteen years, inmates of the workhouses of such unions; and the provisions of the said act which relate to the hiring and purchasing of land in the North and South Dublin unions, the erection of a school there on the east thereof, the maintenance of the children the numbers thereof from each union, the board of management, the officers for the superintendence thereof, and all other provisions relating to such school for the use of the North and South Dublin unions, shall apply to every combination of two or more unions under this act.

3. That the guardians of any union may provide a coffin for the burial of any person who at the time of his death was receiving relief out of the workhouse, or was at the time of his death dependent on any person receiving relief, and charge the cost of providing such coffin to the union at large or electoral division, as the case may be.

4. That the acts now in force for the relief of the destitute poor in Ireland and this act shall be construed as one act, except so far as any one may repeal any previous act.

5. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. XXVI.

An act to remove difficulties in the appointment of collectors of Grand Jury cess in Ireland in certain cases, and to remove doubts as to the jurisdiction of the divisional justices of the police district of Dublin metropolises relating to the recovery of poor rates, and other cases.

Sec. 1. Whenever a Grand Jury at the Assizes shall not have appointed Collectors of Cess for each barony &c., or when the persons appointed shall not have given Security at the Assizes, the Quarter Sessions may appoint Collectors, or take the Security.

2. Personal Representatives of deceased High Constable or Collector to deliver last warrants to the Treasurer of the County, together with the Applotments made.

3. When Monies collected have been duly paid over by personal representative, Grand Jury may allow Poundage on the amount to such personal Representative.

4. Grand Jury may prevent increased poundage where difficulties occur in the collection.

5. Bonds &c. deemed good against Sureties as well as against High Constables or Collectors.

6. The Divisional Justices of Dublin to have like Jurisdiction relating to the recovery of Poor rates as other Justices of the County. Such Justices to have power to act at their respective Offices in all cases as Justices at Petty Sessions.

7. Powers for the recovery of Grand Jury Cess in Dublin.

8. Divisional Justices in Dublin to have the same Powers to collect Grand Jury cess as other Justices in Ireland.

9. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas by the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 116, the Grand Jury of each county in Ireland shall at each assizes appoint a high constable and collector for each barony in such county, to collect all monies presented; and if any high constable or collector shall die before he shall have collected the whole of the money presented, or if any vacancy occur, the justices of the peace at any general quarter sessions, or adjournment thereof, may appoint another high constable or collector pro tempore until a high constable or collector shall be appointed by the Grand Jury; and no person shall act as high constable or collector unless he shall have given security as therein mentioned; and the Grand Jury may present nine pence in the pound on the amount of the collection to be paid to such high constable or collector for his trouble therein: and sometimes properly qualified persons could not be duly appointed at the assizes to act as high constables or collectors, a vacancy in the office of high constable or collector may occur in the interval between the general quarter sessions next before the assizes and the first day of such assizes, whereby the public cess then unpaid cannot be collected on or before such ensuing assizes, and it is expedient to enable the Grand Jury to increase the amount of poundage, Be it therefore enacted that in every case in which any Grand Jury shall not have at assizes appointed a high constable or collector of cess for each barony, or if any vacancy shall occur after the assizes and before the first ensuing general quarter sessions, or in the interval between the first general quarter sessions and the first day of the then next ensuing assizes, the justices of the peace of the said county, &c. at any general quarter sessions, or in case of a vacancy between the first general quarter sessions and the first day of the ensuing assizes, then at a special sessions called by the clerk of the peace in two days after the written requisition of the treasurer, at the county or assize town, or sessions town, of the division in which such barony is situate (giving six days notice thereof to such justices resident in such division) may appoint a high constable or collector of cess; and such person is to give security as directed by the said recited act; and in case any person appointed by the Grand Jury at assizes shall not have given the security by the said act required, such person so appointed may give security before the justices of the peace at the next general or quarter sessions for the division of the county in which such barony is situate; or in default thereof such justices may appoint some other high constable or collector in lieu of the person so appointed by the Grand Jury; and the person so appointed may give security before such justices as if the same were given at the assizes; and all the provisions of the said recited act, or any act amending same, or relating to any high constables or collectors of cess, shall apply to any high constable or collector of cess appointed under this act.

2. That if any vacancy occur by the death of the high constable or collector, his personal representatives shall, previous to such general or special sessions, deliver to the treasurer of the county the warrants issued to said collector, with all applotments made of the sums specified in said warrant; and the deputies are required to attend at such sessions, and deliver to the said justices accounts of the sums received by them, specifying the sum paid by each person named in such applotments, and the sum due, and by whom; and each deputy shall make an affidavit before the said justices, (who are authorized to take the same) of the truth of such accounts, which accounts and affidavits the justices shall transmit to the Treasurer of the county; and in case any such personal representative, or any such deputy shall neglect to deliver over said warrants and applotments, and any money received by them, or refuse to make the affidavit, by this act they shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds, to be recovered, in the name of the Treasurer of the county, by civil bill, before the assistant barrister of such county, for the use of such county.

3. That such personal representatives paying the sum collected, into the county Bank on or before the first day of the next assizes, and producing to the Grand Jury the Treasurer's certificate of such sum having been paid, the Grand Jury without application to presentment sessions, may present poundage on the amount so paid, to be paid to such personal representatives.

4. 'And whereas in certain baronies there is now con'siderable difficulty in the collection of the public money, and nine-pence in the pound has been found not sufficient remuneration for collecting same;' be it therefore enacted, that the Grand Jury at any assizes after the passing of this act, and before the end of 1849, may without application to presentment sessions, present a sum not exceeding one shilling in the pound, to be paid to any such high constable or collector.

5. That any bond and warrant of attorney to confess judgment of any high constable or collector, and any judgment entered up on same, shall be valid, whether given at the assizes before the Grand Jury by whom he shall have been appointed, or before the justices of the peace at any general quarter sessions, or special sessions, and whether such high constable or collector shall have been appointed by the Grand Jury at any assizes, or at any quarter sessions, or adjournment, and shall have subsequently qualified and given security at a subsequent quarter sessions, or adjournment, or at special sessions.

6. 'And whereas by the 6 and 7, W. 4. c. 116, every person duly authorized to collect Grand Jury cess, in default of payment may prefer a complaint to any justice of the peace of the county in which such party may reside; who may summon such party, and direct payment to such collector, or issue his warrant for the levy of the sum due, by distress and sale of the goods of the party complained against. And whereas by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56. for the relief of the destitute poor in Ireland, every rate made under the authority of the said act, may be sued for and recovered by the same means as the Grand Jury cess; and whereas by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 92., for the further amendment of said act, the collector may prefer a complaint to any Justice of the peace of the county in which any lessor resides, who may summon such lessor before him in

DUBLIN, DECEMBER 2, 1848.

WITHOUT expressing any opinion of our own, we think it due to the importance of the questions involved, the interest excited by them, and the conspicuous ability with which they were urged, to lay before our readers a brief statement of the errors assigned, and arguments used, in the cases of William Smith O'Brien and others v. the Queen in error.

Several errors were assigned by each of the prisoners as appearing on the records of their respective convictions for high treason, at the late Special Commission for Clonmel, all of which were elaborately argued in the course of last week before the Court of Queen's Bench sitting in Banc. In this present article we shall confine our observations to a statement of the question involved in one only (apparently the most important) of the alleged errors, namely, the one conversant with what is commonly known as the "ten day point."

The question (stripped of all collateral considerations respecting the applicability of a plea to the state of facts in the case, or the form of the particular plea which raises the question,) is; whether the prisoners were entitled to be furnished with a copy of the indictment, a list of the witnesses for the crown, and of the names of the jurors ten days before the trial. The Crown asserts the negative, the prisoners the affirmative.

The question was raised in the following manner. When the prisoners were called upon in the Court below to plead guilty or not guilty, their counsel moved for a postponement of the trial on the ground that the indictment, the list of the witnesses for the crown, and of the jurors' names, had not been (as it was insisted they ought to have been) furnished ten days previously. The Crown successfully resisted this application, whereupon the prisoners put in a plea in suspension or a declinatory plea, which embodied the statement on which the previous motion to postpone the trial had been grounded. To this plea the Crown demurred, and judgment was given in its favour.

Before stating the substance of the enactments upon the construction of which the decision of the point at issue depends, it is necessary to premise that the indictment in each case contains six counts almost similarly worded, that the five first counts charge the prisoners with the treason of levying war against the Queen, and that the sixth count charges the treason to be a compassing of the Queen's death, and alleges, as one of the overt acts in support of such charge, a conspiracy to put the Queen to death.

The statutes applicable to this branch of the case are three; first, the 36 Geo. 3, c. 7, ss. 1 & 5, (English); secondly, the 57 Geo. 3, c. 6, s. 1; thirdly, the 11 Vic. c. 12, ss. 1 & 2.

The first section of the 36th Geo. 3, c. 7, enacts, among other matters, that "if any person shall, during the life of his Majesty, the then king, and until the end of the next session of parliament after a demise of the crown, compass the death of the king, his heirs or successors, and such compassing shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writings, or by any overt act or deed, every such person, upon conviction, shall be adjudged a traitor, and suffer death, and lose and forfeit as in cases of high treason." And the fifth section provides, "that every person that shall be indicted for any offence, made or declared treason by this act, shall be entitled to the benefit of the act of 7th Wm. 3rd, chap. 3, and also of the act of the 7th of Anne, chap. 11."

No point in the argument turned upon the act of Wm. 3rd. The 7th of Anne, chap. 11, sec. 11, enacts, "that when any person is indicted for high treason, a list of the witnesses that shall be produced at the trial, for proving the said indictment, and of the jury, mentioning the names, profession, and place of abode of the said witnesses and jurors, be also given, at the same time that the copy of the indictment is given to the party indicted, and that copies of the indictment, for all the offences aforesaid, with such lists shall be delivered to the party indicted ten days before the trial, and in the presence of two or more credible witnesses."

The first section of the 57th Geo. 3d. c. 6, after reciting the first section of the said 36th Geo. 3, and further reciting, that "it is necessary and expedient that such of the provisions of the said act, (viz. 36th Geo. 3), as would expire at the end of the next session of parliament, after the demise of the crown, should be further continued and made perpetual," enacts, "that all and every the herein before recited provisions which relate to the heirs and successors of His Majesty shall be perpetual."

One important question which arose in the course of the argument was, to what extent the last stated enactment perpetuated the 36th Geo. 3. The counsel for the Crown insisted that the first section of that act, namely—the section which made or declared what should be deemed treason within its provisions—was alone thereby perpetuated, and that the fifth section of that act, namely—the one which conferred the privilege on the accused, previous to trial,—was unaffected, and they rested their view of the case upon the words in the 1st section of the 57th Geo. 3, "hereinbefore recited provisions." The counsel for the prisoners on the other hand contended, that the first section of the 57th Geo. 3 not only perpetuated the first, but also the fifth section of the 36th Geo. 3, and they rested their arguments, not only on the words of the first section of the 57th Geo. 3, which recited, that "it was expedient to perpetuate such of the provisions of the act of 36th Geo. 3, as would expire at the end of the next session of parliament, after the demise of the crown," (under which description, both the first and fifth sections were included, and thereby as they contended, brought expressly within the words "hereinbefore recited provisions" used in the enacting part of the first section of the 57th Geo. 3,) but also they contended that even if the enacting part of the first section of the 57th Geo. 3, did not, in express terms, extend to the fifth section of the 36th Geo. 3, it did so by implication: for that in perpetuating the section, which made, or declared what should be treason, it also necessarily perpetuated the section which regulated the mode of trial of that treason, as an incident or accessory thereto.

The provisions of the several statutes hitherto detailed were (as contended for by the crown, and but faintly denied by the prisoners' counsel,) at their passing, inapplicable to Ireland, and we now proceed to the consideration of the third statute mentioned above, namely, the 11th Vic. c. 12, commonly called the Crown and government security act, which, according to the argument for the prisoners, extended to Ireland those provisions contained in the first and fifth sections of the 36th Geo. 3, which we have previously set out in full. The first section of the 11th Vic. after reciting the first section of the said act of the 36th Geo. 3, and the first section of the said act of the 57th Geo. 3, and that doubts were entertained, whether the provisions made perpetual by the said act of the 57th

Geo. 3, were, by the said last mentioned act extended to Ireland, and that it was expedient to repeal all such of the provisions so made perpetual, as did not relate to offences, against the person of the sovereign, and to extend to Ireland, such of the provisions of the said acts as are not thereby repealed, enacts, "that from the passing of this act, the provisions of the said act of the 36th Geo. 3, made perpetual by the act of the 57th of the same reign, and all the provisions of the said last mentioned act in relation thereto, save such of the same respectively, as relate to the compassing or imagining the death or destruction of the heirs and successors of His said Majesty, King Geo. 3, and the expressing, uttering, or declaring of such compassing or imaginings, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed;" and the second section enacts, "that such of the said recited provisions made perpetual by the said act of the 57th of Geo. 3, as are not thereby repealed, shall extend to, and be in force, in that part of the united kingdom called Ireland."

Such being the enactment confessedly applicable to Ireland, the counsel for the crown contended, that only such part of the first section of the 36th Geo. 3, as we have previously stated in full, was by the 2nd section of the 11th Vic. extended to Ireland, and therefore, that the prisoners were not entitled to the benefits conferred by the fifth section of the 36th Geo. 3 upon the accused. On the other hand, the counsel for the prisoners contended that the said second section of the 11th Vic. extended to this country not only the first but also the fifth section of the 36th Geo. 3, that the said second section of the 11th Vic. extended "such of the said recited provisions made perpetual by the 57th Geo. 3;" that the provisions recited were "such of the provisions of the 36th Geo. 3, made perpetual by the 57th Geo. 3," as related to the compassing the Queen's death, that upon reference to the 57th Geo. 3, it appears that "such of the provisions of the 36th Geo. 3, were thereby made perpetual, as would expire after the first session of parliament following a demise of the crown;" and, that upon reference to the 36th Geo. 3, it appears that the provisions which would so expire were the first section declaratory of treason, and the fifth section regulating the mode of trial for the treason so declared.

The foregoing is a brief epitome of the arguments upon one of the many points raised and discussed. It refers indeed to only one view of the statutes we have above quoted. A different view from that presented was taken by some of the counsel on both sides, grounded upon the allegation that all but the first section of the 57th Geo. 3 extended to this country. We shall on a future occasion state the arguments upon the form of the plea—upon the question whether the subject matter of the plea was at all pleadable—and upon the effect of the verdict of acquittal upon the sixth count, as well as on some of the other grounds of error relied on.

We give elsewhere the only two decisions yet made on the act for the sale of incumbered estates. We may deduce from them first, that all parties shall have notice; secondly, that no technical objection shall, if possible, be allowed to impede the working of the measure. There have as yet been but few petitions presented, and they are not likely to be numerous until the General Orders have been promulgated, the undue acceleration of which is not desirable, as on them will depend the acceptance which the public and the professions will give to the statute in its complete form. There will be some difficulty—the necessary attendant of every measure which effects important changes—in dealing with those cases in which foreclosure suits are already in existence. We have little doubt that existing rights will be dealt with justly, and that they will not be displaced by giving to the statute a harsh retrospective operation.

THE legislature have ventured on the bold experiment of extending the provisions of the English Small Debts Act,* with some improvement in the preparation of the measure, to this country. An abridgment of the statute will be found elsewhere in our columns of this week. The period for its introduction was a trying one; individual and national probity are never very prominent when individual and national distress are very severe; and neither amongst the upper nor lower classes of our countrymen have honesty and prudence been striking characteristics. We were always predisposed to the contrary, and our national propensities do not lie in abeyance in times of wide-spread calamity. These causes produce effects; tradesmen trust only when their remedy is stringent, and in periods of distress—as the chances of payment are less—their confidence becomes more circumscribed.

The marked distinction of doing away with arrest of the person on mesne process—that is, before the debt is proved to be due, and doing it away after it has been established by due course of law—is obvious. To the justice of the former we subscribe; the expediency of the latter has been much debated, more especially when considered with reference to the upper classes. Rank, position, liberty, are not too heavy forfeits for extravagance and dishonesty. Payment of demands justly due cannot be enforced with too strong a sanction. Goods, lands, person, have hitherto been the creditor's pledge for payment; the last, as the most severe, should be the most tardily resorted to, and the scope of legislation for many years past has been to give facilities to recover debts from the two former, and to make the creditor only avail himself of the last as his ultimate resort. The debtor, down to the year 1840, was little favoured in this country, for here executions against both goods and person could—we are sorry to say can—be issued in any order the debtor pleases. Brien v. Brien, (1 Hud. & Bro. 300); Barton v. Seymour, (ib. 304). First, an execution against the goods, then the person, and then again the goods, the creditor lying all the time in gaol.

The 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 25, enacted, that if any judgment creditor should have obtained a charge, or be entitled to the benefit of any security whatsoever under the powers of the act, and should afterwards, and before the property so charged or secured should have been converted into money or realized, cause the person of the judgment debtor to be taken or charged in execution upon such judgment, then, and in such case, such judgment creditor should be deemed to have relinquished all right and title to the benefit of such charge or security, and should forfeit the same accordingly.

This was legislating in the proper spirit, the act gave great facilities to judgment creditors to realize their demands out of the debtor's property, but imposed these reasonable terms, that if creditors adopted the aids given by the statute, they should suspend the enforcement of their rights against the person, until they abandoned the statutable remedy. The operation of the measure is, however, limited to those cases in which creditors adopt the benefit of its provisions, and it is still in their power to arrest a defendant, and, if he remain in prison, subsequently issue execution against his goods, and only in the event of satisfaction being obtained by their sale, can he apply for his discharge. By the common law of England an arrest of the person was of itself a discharge of the debt, and in Ireland the common law was the same, but the 35 of Geo. 3, c. 30, Irish, conferred upon the creditor the power of first arresting the debtor, and then seizing his goods. In our judgment the process should be statutably reversed, and the act we have alluded to repealed.

But whatever may be the policy of abolishing arrest of the person in all cases, unquestionably the experiment may be most safely tested in those where the amount of the debt is small, and the debtor in an humble class of life. The liabilities of the working classes are more generally the result of necessity than of extravagance, and arrest, as a means of procuring payment, is generally inefficient. Cui bono to the creditor the transfer of a semi-starved pauper from a cabin to a gaol, where he will be maintained at the public expense, whilst his wife and children are thrown on the union? He is deprived of the only capital he possesses—his labour—and his creditor gains nothing. The poor have few immunities, and we grudge them no boon which humane legislation can confer; in the present instance its value will be diminished by the restriction imposed upon credit.

Having said so much on the principle of the act, let us examine what it proposes to effect.

To abolish arrest of the person in all cases for debts under ten pounds.

The exceptions being, where they have been incurred fraudulently, or without probable means of paying them, or where the liabilities are the result of verdicts against defendants in actions for malicious prosecution, deceit, libel, slander, criminal conversation, seduction, or breach of promise of marriage.

The first section exempts defendants from arrest on judgments, decrees, or orders of the superior courts of law, or of any inferior courts when the sum, exclusive of the costs, shall not exceed ten pounds, and exempts from arrest the body of any plaintiff, defendant, or other person, in any action or suit founded on any judgment, decree, or order, for the recovery of costs only, when such costs shall not exceed ten pounds.

In the English act, 7 & 8 Vic. c. 96, s. 57, the case of a plaintiff was not expressly provided for, the words being:—"no person shall be taken or charged in execution upon any judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of any debt wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed the sum of £20, exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment." And, in the event of his being non-suited, or otherwise defeated, it has been made a question whether he was protected by the act. See Newton v. Ld. Albert Conyngham, (12 Jur. 356). Mr. Gernon, who loses no opportunity of pointing out the merits of the statute, has not sufficiently adverted to this distinction. It is observable that in all our law reforms where acts limited to England have pioneered the way, we have gained by the delay; having had the experience and the pattern to guide us. We do not, however, affirm that the benefit is very manifest of shielding from arrest a litigious plaintiff who fails either in point of law or merits. The branch of the section which saves defendants from arrest will be a very good guide to juries as to the amount of damages in what are called "dirty actions," pauper plaintiffs suing in actions of trespass, or trespass on the case. Juries have it in their power to deprive such litigants of one means of recovering their damages, by limiting the verdict to £10.

Whilst the act shields the debtor in the first instance, it does not profess to do so altogether. If his goods do not realize sufficient to pay the debt, he can be summoned before the assistant-barrister of the district to shew cause why he should not be arrested; and, if it shall appear that the defendant, or any one in trust for him, had property which ought to be administered under the insolvent acts, or that the defendant is of sufficient ability to pay the debt, the assistant-barrister is empowered to have him arrested, or, in the case of fraud, or incurring the debt under false pretences, or without having had a reasonable expectation of being able to pay it, or, in case of fraudulent transfer, he may be committed for three months to the common gaol, or house of correction—there ought to have been the addenda, with or without hard labour—all remedies against the property being saved. These are excellent provisions, and are a great protection to the creditor.

The 4th and 5th sections apply to cases where the goods have been found insufficient after decree. The 6th gives the barrister jurisdiction, in the first instance, to commit the defendant, provided the plaintiff shall have annexed to, or indorsed on the civil bill process, a notice of his intention to proceed under the act.

Mr. Gernon remarks that "it will probably be a question of some nicety for the consideration of plaintiffs to determine in what cases they will resort to the notice or indorsement prescribed by this section," and having marked in the margin, p. 33, "Safe rule for proceeding submitted," he observes with much nécessité, "It will therefore be a matter entirely for the discretion of a plaintiff, or his attorney, to determine whether he will, in the first instance, run the risk of failure in proving fraud, and subjecting himself to the payment of costs; but perhaps the safest rule to guide a party will be, that where there exists a reasonable suspicion of fraud, &c., and a reasonable expectation of being able to prove its existence at the hearing; in such a case it will be prudent to resort to the civil bill with notice or indorsement under this section." The promise in the margin of a "safe rule," and the non-fulfilment in the text, are strikingly opposed.

Our author, we are sure, will excuse us, if we mingle a little playfulness with the dry matter which our pages must generally contain.

There is one part of the statute which we consider highly objectionable. The inquiry as to fraud, improvidence, and fraudulent transfer of the debtor's property—questions of great nicety—is left entirely to the Assistant barrister, from whom there is to be no appeal! Whilst we do not question the integrity, we are constrained to demur to the universal competency of these local judges, considering not only the fallibility of human judgment, but also that they owe their elevation to political connection, independently of, and not unfrequently in contradistinction to, professional capacity. We cannot have confidence in the unerring correctness of their decisions, and yet the liberty of the subject is involved in them. Our whole judicial system is one of salutary checks, grade over grade, judge over judge; on general, very obvious, and well-understood constitutional grounds, we protest against conferring more irresponsible power than is requisite for the effective administration of justice, and lament the increasing tendency of modern legislation to vest uncontrolled power in a single person whose decision is irreversible, and in abrogation of the ancient system of trial by jury.

The 7th section gives power to any court, in cases to which the act relates, to arrest a defendant about to leave Ireland, either on the hearing of the case in the first instance, or after decree upon ex parte application. In the latter instance a defendant may apply to be discharged on shewing cause.

Mr. Gernon discusses with much force the difficulties that will arise under this section. Can the Assistant-barrister adjudicate otherwise than in open court? Before whom can a defendant, who has been arrested after decree, shew cause for his discharge, where the barrister has concluded his sessions, and left his jurisdiction? These are defects that require amendment. The powers conferred upon the Assistant-barrister to take affidavits in any part of Ireland—which applies to all cases—and to compel the attendance of witnesses not resident within his jurisdiction will be found very useful; we regret that the latter power has been limited to cases falling within the provisions of the act under consideration.

The power of summarily evicting tenants residing in towns, who hold for not more than a month, and at a rent not exceeding £1 per month, is a boon to the landlords of such very undesirable tenants.

In parting with Mr. Gernon's book, we wish to speak kindly, yet impartially, and we think the arrangement of his subject unhappy. The Act afforded too slender materials for a series of comments, placed under each section, the commentary, sometimes, being a repetition of the text. This arrangement may pass uncensured when adopted with reference to acts of parliament spread over a large space, and comprising detached subjects, but is not suited to a short statute. Our author does himself and his subject injustice, who thus splits into fragments, matter that connected together would have formed a neat treatise. We do not wish, however, to detract from the practical utility of the work, it will be found a useful compendium of the statute in a convenient form, and the legal propositions are in our judgment correct.

petty sessions; and direct payment of such money to such collector, and in default may issue his warrant for the levy thereof; and every rate made under the authority of the said act, or the first-recited act, and any money directed to be levied in the county or the county of the city of Dublin, may be levied, by the same means, as the grand jury cess, and whereas doubts exist whether the divisional justices so as to exercise jurisdiction for the hearing of complaints as to nonpayment of poor rates or for the recovery of poor rates within the said police districts, and doubts exist whether the police officers at which such justices preside be petty sessions within the meaning of the said 'last-recited act or acts,' for the removal of such doubts be it enacted, that the several divisional justices of the police district of Dublin metropolis shall for the purposes of the said acts and every other act heretofore made or hereafter to be made with respect to the raising, levying, or enforcing payment of any poor rate in Ireland, have the same powers, and jurisdiction within the police districts of Dublin metropolis as any justice has within his county in respect to poor rates made or to be made in Ireland; and wherever, any proceeding, is or shall be authorized or directed by a justice of the peace at petty sessions, or by justices of the peace of any county, &c., the said divisional justices of Dublin metropolis, or any one or more of them, shall have all such powers and jurisdictions at the divisional police offices within such police district of Dublin metropolis at which they shall preside as any justice at petty sessions.

7. That after the passing of this act the collectors of grand jury cess in the county of the city of Dublin, may collect, sue for, and recover the grand jury cess of such county of the city of Dublin, by all the ways and means, may be collected and levied in any other county in Ireland.

8. That the divisional justices of the police district of Dublin metropolis shall, for the purposes of every act made or to be made with respect to the raising, or enforcing payment of grand jury cess in the county of the city of Dublin, have the same powers and jurisdiction within the police district of Dublin metropolis, as any justice of any county in Ireland has within his respective county with respect to grand jury cess to be raised within the same.

9. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. XXVII.

An Act to authorize the inclosure of certain lands, in pursuance of the third and also of a special report of the inclosure commissioners for England and Wales.

[22d July, 1848.]

CAP. XXVIII.

An Act to amend the Law of Imprisonment for Debt in Ireland, and to improve the remedies for the recovery of debts and of the possession of tenements situate in cities and towns, in certain cases.

[22d July, 1848.]

Sec. 1. After commencement of this act, no writ or process for arrest shall issue from certain courts in Ireland for debts or sums not exceeding £10., save as herein excepted.

2. Such writs, &c. for sums not exceeding £10 issued before commencement of act, but not executed, shall not be executed against the person, save as herein excepted.
3. Persons in custody on or after the commencement of the act under any such writs, &c. for sums not exceeding £10, shall be discharged on application to the Sheriff, &c. Judgment, &c. to remain in force notwithstanding the discharge of the debtor.
4. When a defendant, &c. is exempted from arrest or discharged from custody by virtue of this act, the plaintiff may serve a Civil Bill Process, requiring the defendant to show cause why process of arrest or committal should not issue. Civil Bill Process to be according to Form (A) in Schedule.
5. If Assistant Barrister shall find that defendant has property fit to be administered under the Insolvent Act, he may direct a process of arrest to issue, or if debt contracted fraudulently may commit him. In default of defendant's appearance, decree may be made.
6. Power to examine or commit at the original hearing of a Civil Bill in certain cases.
7. Upon affidavit that a defendant is about to quit Ireland, he may by a special order be taken in execution.
8. Nothing herein to extend to proceedings relating to revenue of Excise, &c.
9. Toole and actual necessities of judgment debtors not to be seized in execution.
10. Power to the Clerk of the Peace to issue summonses to witnesses.
11. Affidavits to Civil Bill proceedings may be taken by Assistant Barristers out of their counties.
12. Office copies of Wills to be evidence of the contents thereof in Civil Bill Courts.
13. Official copy of Judgment to be evidence.
14. Service of Process in Civil Bill.
15. Affidavits, when required to be made in Great Britain, may be made before Extraordinary Commissioners of the Court of Chancery in Ireland. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 105.
16. Possession of small tenements may be recovered by summons before Justices of the Peace.
17. The manner in which such summons shall be served.
18. Interpretation of Act.
19. To extend to Ireland only.
20. Commencement of Act.
21. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas it is expedient to limit the present power of arrest for debts, damages, demands, or costs, under process from courts of law or equity or inferior courts in Ireland: be it enacted, that from the commencement of this act no writ, process, or warrant to arrest the body of any defendant in any action or suit, (actions for malicious prosecution, deceit, libel, slander, criminal conversation, seduction, or breach of promise of marriage, only excepted,) shall be issued in Ireland, founded on a judgment, decree, or order of any of the superior or inferior courts in Ireland, when the sum to be paid under such judgment, decree, or order, exclusive of the costs, if any, thereby recovered, shall not exceed the sum of ten pounds; nor shall any process, or warrant to arrest the body of any plaintiff, defendant, or other person in any action or suit be issued, founded on any judgment, decree, or order for costs only, when such costs due shall not exceed ten pounds; nor founded on any decree or order of any court of equity, ecclesiastical court, or court of admiralty in Ireland, for the payment of money, whether wholly or partly costs when the sum due shall not exceed ten pounds.

2. That in case any such writ, process, or warrant to arrest the person (save as before excepted) founded on any judgment, &c. when the sum due shall not exceed the sums before mentioned and shall not have been executed before the day of the commencement of this act, same shall not, after said day, be executed against the person of the party against whom issued.

3. That in any case in which any person shall, before the commencement of this act, be in custody by virtue of any such process, &c. founded on any such judgment, &c. (save as excepted,) when the sum shall not exceed the sums before mentioned, the sheriff or officer in whose custody such person shall be detained, is required, on his application, to discharge him forthwith as to such execution, &c. without prejudice to any other lawful right to detain such person in custody provided that the judgment, &c. whereupon such party was taken in execution or arrested shall remain in force to the intent that the creditor, &c. may have remedy and execution thereupon against the property of such party in such manner as otherwise he could have done in case such party had never been taken in execution upon such judgment, &c. or order, and provided, that in the cases before mentioned, whenever before this act process against the person of any debtor for such sum not exceeding ten pounds is now the only process issued out of any court such court after the passing of this act, may instead of such process against the person issue a process in the nature of an execution, &c. against the goods of the debtor, for the seizure and sale of same as heretofore issued in such cases.

4. That in all cases in which any judgment, &c. for any such sum, shall be had, under and by virtue of which the defendant might if this act had not been passed be arrested, or whenever any defendant shall be discharged from custody by virtue of this act, and the plaintiff shall not have recovered his demand out of the goods of such defendant the plaintiff may cause a civil bill process to be issued against the defendant requiring him to appear before the Assistant Barrister for the county at the general quarter sessions for the division in which such defendant shall reside, and show cause why execution should not issue against his person in respect of such judgment, &c. and such process shall be according to the form (A.) in the schedule to this act, or as near thereto as the nature of the case will admit; and the Assistant Barristers shall have power to determine such civil bill; and the service and proceedings relating thereto, and the costs shall be subject to like regulations, as any civil bill in cases of debt or assumpsit, save as herein otherwise provided.

5. That at the hearing of such civil bill the Assistant Barrister may cause the plaintiff and defendant, or either of them, to be examined on oath, and investigate the amount of the demands due by the defendant, and the nature and amount of any property he or any one in trust for him is, was, or may be possessed of or entitled to, and the circumstances under which the debt due to the plaintiff was incurred, and the means and expectation of payment thereof; and if the defendant or any one in trust for him is possessed of property which, regard being had to the nature thereof, and to the debts due by the defendant, and to the security of his creditors, ought, in the opinion of the Assistant Barrister, to be administered under insolvent acts, or that the defendant is able to discharge the plaintiff's debt, then the Assistant Barrister may issue a decree, to take in execution the body of the defendant to satisfy the plaintiff's demand and costs, with stay of execution, which decree may be according to the form (B.) to this act annexed, or as the case may require; and under such decree the defendant may be arrested and detained in custody, but if at such hearing it shall appear to such Assistant Barrister that there is not property of the defendant which ought to be administered under the said acts or that the defendant is not able to discharge the plaintiff's debt, but that he has obtained credit from the plaintiff under false pretences, or by fraud or breach of trust, or has contracted such debt without a reasonable expectation of being able to pay same, or shall have made any gift, or transfer of property, or charged, or concealed same, with intent to defraud his creditors, the Assistant Barrister may by a decree according to the form (B.) to this act annexed, or as the case may require, order such defendant to be committed to the gaol or house of correction of the county, or place in which the defendant is resident, for any period not exceeding three months, unless the plaintiff be sooner paid, without prejudice to any remedies for the recovery of the plaintiff's demand out of the property of the defendant: provided that the plaintiff need not appear in person at the hearing of such civil bill: also, there shall be no appeal from any such decision of the Assistant Barrister; and in case of a dismissal the costs shall be paid by the plaintiff or set off against his demand, and if the defendant shall not personally appear at such hearing the Assistant Barrister may proceed to the hearing in his absence, and make such decree as he shall think fit.

6. That in any civil bill where the power of arrest would otherwise be taken away under this act, the Assistant Barrister at the original hearing of the cause, may examine the defendant and the plaintiff, and grant a decree against the person of the defendant, or commit him to prison, as if the plaintiff had proceeded specially by a civil bill for such purpose, as in the last preceding provision mentioned, provided that the plaintiff shall cause a notice to be annexed to or endorsed on the civil bill process, stating that he will proceed under the powers and provisions of this act, inserting the title thereof.

7. That in any action in any court for such sums as aforesaid, when a judgment, &c. for such sums shall be obtained, where the defendant might be arrested, if this act had not been passed, if the plaintiff show, to the satisfaction of the court in which such action shall be brought, or such judgment, &c. obtained, that there is probable cause for believing that the defendant, or one of them, is about to quit Ireland unless he be arrested, any such court may, upon the hearing of the case, in the first instance grant an execution, &c. against the person of the defendant, or (in the case of an execution, &c. theretofore obtained) direct such defendant to be arrested under such judgment, &c.; and plaintiff may arrest the defendant, as if this act had not passed: provided that in the case of any such order for arrest in respect of a judgment, &c. theretofore obtained, the person so arrested may apply to the court in which such judgment, &c. shall have been obtained, for a rule on the plaintiff to show cause why he should not be discharged, and the court may make such order thereon as shall seem fit, or direct the costs of the application to be paid by either party, not exceeding in any civil bill court the costs of a decree; but if the party arrested shall be discharged, it shall be without prejudice to any remedies for the recovery of the plaintiff's demand out of the property of the defendant, and the execution, &c. against the person may be changed to an execution, &c. against such property.

8. Provided, that nothing in the preceding enactments contained shall affect any informations or other proceedings under any of the statutes relating to Her Majesty's revenue of Excise, or Customs, Stamps, Taxes, or Post Office.

9. And whereas it is expedient to protect the tools and actual necessities belonging to judgment debtors from being seized in execution; be it enacted, that from the passing of this act the wearing apparel and bedding of any debtor under a judgment, &c. or of his family, and the implements of his trade, the value of same not exceeding in the whole five pounds, shall not be liable to seizure under any execution, &c. against his goods.

10. That for the purposes of this act the clerks of the peace may issue a summons in the nature of a subpoena ad testificandum or duces tecum to any person in Ireland requiring him to appear and give evidence before the Assistant Barrister; and in case he shall not attend, the Assistant Barrister may upon proof of service six days before the day of appearance, and that the expenses of such person had been paid or tendered at the time of service, award such penalty against such person not exceeding five pounds, as he shall deem fit, causing to be filed of record in his court an affidavit of the time, place, and manner of such service and of the tender of expenses, to be made by the person proving same; which penalty shall be paid to the party at whose instance the summons shall have issued; and which together with expenses paid to such witness, shall be recoverable in the civil bill court of the place where awarded, or where such witness resides: and the certificate of the clerk of the peace of such county, signed by him, of such penalty having been awarded, shall be prima facie evidence thereof: and the Assistant Barrister may award such sum for the expen-

of witnesses as he may deem proper, not exceeding five pounds in the case of any one witness; to be recoverable in addition to the sum ordered to be paid in such decree or order, and when payable by a plaintiff in like manner as before provided as to the cost of a dismissal.

11. That every Assistant Barrister, although he shall not be at the time within his county may take any affidavit concerning any action or proceeding in his court, and administer the necessary oath and same shall be of the same force, and the penalty for false swearing shall be the same, and the same fees shall be payable thereon, as if same was taken by the Assistant Barrister in the civil bill court within his county: provided that every such affidavit shall, within six days after same shall be made, be delivered to the clerk of the peace of such county, or at his office, to be filed in said court, otherwise same to be void.

12. That in every proceeding before any Assistant Barrister, an office copy of any original will or other testamentary document lodged in any ecclesiastical court in Ireland, or in the registry thereof, and which shall appear by such copy to have been duly proved, and probate or letters of administration thereof granted, shall, upon proof of the signature of the proper officer of such ecclesiastical court certifying same to be a true copy, be admitted as prima facie evidence of the contents of such original will; and the proper officer of such ecclesiastical court is hereby required to make a memorandum in writing upon such copy of the time at which, and the person to whom such probate or administration was granted: providing, that the party producing such copy shall give notice to the adverse party in writing six days before producing same.

13. That in every such proceeding an office copy of any judgment, decree, or order, by any court of law or equity in Ireland, certified by the proper officer of such court, shall, upon proof of such officer's handwriting, be taken as prima facie evidence of such judgment, decree, or order.

14. That the service of any civil bill process on the defendant, or the wife, child, or servant of the defendant, at his shop, office, warehouse, or place of business, shall be as valid as service at the residence of the defendant: provided that no such process shall be served on Good Friday or Christmas day.

15. 'And doubts have arisen whether, under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 105, the affidavits mentioned in the 8th section of said act can be made before the Extraordinary Commissioners of the Court of Chancery in Ireland for taking affidavits in Great Britain: and whereas it is expedient that the said commissioners should have the power to take such affidavits: same may be made before said commissioners, as same are now made before the Masters in ordinary and extraordinary of the said court in Ireland.

16. 'And certain tenements and parts of tenements are held in cities and towns in Ireland, at small monthly and weekly rents, and it is just that where the power to enforce the payment of such rents by arrest of the person is taken away, greater facility should be given for the recovery of the possession of such premises: be it enacted, that from the commencement of this act, when the term of the tenant of any house, or part of a house, in any county of a city, or county of a town, or borough, or market town, in Ireland, held for any term not exceeding one calendar month, at a rent not exceeding one pound sterling by the month, shall have ended, or been determined by a notice to quit, and such tenant, or any person by whom the premises or any part thereof shall be then occupied, shall refuse to quit and deliver up possession thereof the landlord or his known agent or receiver may cause such person to be served with a summons in writing, signed by a justice of the peace having jurisdiction in the place in which said premises are situate, to appear before any two or more justices at any court of petty sessions, &c., to show cause why possession of said premises should not be delivered up to such landlord or his agent, or receiver; and if the tenant shall not appear, or shall appear, and shall not, to the satisfaction of such justices, show cause why possession should not be given, and shall still refuse to deliver up the possession of said premises, the said landlord, or his agent, or receiver, may give proof of the holding, and of the determination of the Tenancy, with the time and manner thereof, and where the title of the landlord hath accrued since the letting of the premises, the right by which he claims the possession, and such justice of the peace may issue a warrant to any constable of the district within which such premises shall be situate, requiring him, within not less than seven or more than ten clear days from the date thereof, to give possession of the premises to such landlord or agent; and same shall be a sufficient warrant to said constable to enter upon the premises, with such assistants as he shall deem necessary, and to give possession accordingly: provided that such entry shall not be made on a Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas day, or at any time except between the hours of nine in the morning and four in the afternoon: provided, that nothing herein contained shall protect any person by whom such warrant shall be sued out, from any action by any such tenant or occupier in respect of such entry and taking possession, where such person had not, at the time of suing out the same as aforesaid, lawful right to the possession of the said premises.

17. That such summons may be served personally or by leaving same with some person in occupation of such house or part of a house, and where the tenant shall not reside therein, by serving same personally or by leaving same at his abode four clear days before the day for the hearing of the said summons: provided, that if the person so holding over cannot be found, and admission into the premises cannot be obtained, and the abode of such person shall either not be known or admission thereto cannot be obtained, the posting of the summons on some conspicuous part of the premises so held over shall be deemed to be good service upon such person.

18. That in construing this act and the schedule thereto, unless the context shall exclude such construction, words importing the singular number shall extend to several persons or things; and words importing the plural number, shall extend to one person or thing; and words importing the masculine gender only, shall extend to a female; and the expression "Assistant Barrister" shall include the Recorder of Dublin, and the chairman of the sessions of the peace for the county of Dublin, the Recorder of Cork or of Derry, or the Recorder of any other corporation acting and holding courts pursuant to the act for the regulation of municipal corporations in Ireland; and the word "decree" shall include a dismissal and a renewal of a civil bill decree; the word "plaintiff" shall include a petitioner; the word "defendant" shall include a respondent; and the words "action" or "suit" shall include a petition or matter.

19. That this act shall extend only to Ireland.

20. That this act shall commence and take effect on the first day of November, 1848.

21. That this act may be amended or repealed, &c.

Sir,

"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has many advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture; it is susceptible of a very high polish, it does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

TROUSERS.—The numerous testimonials received by JAMES O'DRISCOLL in approval of the elegance, ease, and peculiar style of his Trousers, and likewise the very flattering patronage bestowed on him by the higher classes of society, induces him to apprise his patrons, and those gentlemen who have not hitherto honored him with their order, that he has secured the services of a few of the most experienced Parisian workmen for the winter season. J. O'D's practical knowledge as a Trouser Cutter having been fully tested in the first houses of the British na-

DUBLIN, DECEMBER 9, 1848.

THE imperfections, we have pointed out in the mode of valuation adopted under the poor law, and in the construction of the rate-books, introduce difficulties into the subsequent operations necessary for the collection of the rate; and, coupled with the principle that when the time allowed for appealing has elapsed, the rate-books are conclusive as to the liability of the rate-payer, have given rise to much vexations and expensive litigation.

The easiest and cheapest mode of enforcing the payment of poor-rate, is by distress. However, it is clear this mode cannot be adopted when the holding liable cannot be identified. Hence the collector is obliged to proceed in the Petit Session Courts, where he obtains a decree, as a matter of course, (the party summoned being concluded by the rate-book) for the amount charged, and costs, which latter item is not unfrequently the greater of the two. We have seen decrees issue for poor-rate and costs where the party decreed was admitted to have had no holding in the townland for which he was rated.

From immediate lessors, payment is enforced either by summons before a magistrate, by civil bill, or action in the superior courts; the two former modes are limited in their application, and the latter is encumbered with much technical difficulty, and attended with great expense. The necessity for these proceedings is to be referred, also, in most instances, to the imperfections already pointed out in the construction of the rate-books,—persons being set down as immediate lessors, who, in reality, are not so. A stranger may be set down as immediate lessor, who, as he could not suspect, would not be likely to examine the rate-books; and yet, if the stranger did not get his name removed by appeal, within the time limited for so doing, he would not only be liable, but would be the only party liable to pay whatever might be charged against him, and neither the Guardians nor the Commissioners (though aware of the error) could remove the name thus improperly set down, or place the name of the person really liable in its room. If the guardians, instead of proceeding in such cases, could correct the rate-book, when the party applied to for payment could prove to their satisfaction that he was not the party liable; or if, under these circumstances, an appeal were given, much litigation might be avoided, the rate better collected, and the poor law rendered less unpopular.

The staff of the poor law is expensive, and necessarily so. Where there is much and widely-spread distress, it requires vigilant superintendence to administer relief to the really distressed, and to those only. If we could see that the tendency of the poor law was to relieve the country, by diminishing, either directly or indirectly, the amount of destitution, we would find no fault with a little expense on this head, though the country can ill afford any extravagant expenditure.

The persons relieved are classed as the infirm and able-bodied. The former are a very extensive class, and must be regarded, almost, as one of the permanent charges on the unions, to be diminished only by the dying off of these unfortunates. However, even in this way, there is little chance of getting rid of this source of expense, as the gaps which are thus created are constantly filled up by paupers from the able-bodied class, numbers of whom, misery and disease—the consequence of want of sufficient food, of clothing, and frequently of shelter—are reducing to the infirm class; these, of course, as unfit for any kind of employment, are supported gratuitously at the expense of the union.

Not so the able-bodied; they, as a condition to their being supported, must place their labour entirely at the disposal of the guardians; when the workhouses afford sufficient accommodation, they are employed in them; when they do not, an order for out-door relief is issued by the commissioners, and the able-bodied are employed in gangs, under overseers, in the neighbourhood of their villages.

Their employment generally is breaking stones, enormous heaps of which may be seen collected in fields, or along the public roads, every-where through the distressed districts; other occupations—provided they are entirely useless—are sometimes resorted to,—the principle of the poor law being, that the paupers should exert the maximum of labour in the production of the minimum of return.

So much for the valuation, the collection, and the application of the revenues under the poor law.

Whether the present system of raising the revenues, and applying them, has a tendency to diminish the amount of destitution—and, if not, why it fails to do so—must be sought for more in facts than in theory.

And what are the facts? Where almost whole towns are taken to supply additional workhouse accommodation, where the out-door relief-lists are counted by thousands, the country is a waste! Gangs of able-bodied paupers are employed at stone-breaking on roads traversing rich districts, where the thistle and the nettle take the place which should be occupied by the turnip and the oat; and, as a general rule, it may be stated that the greater the number of persons employed under the poor law in any union, the more land will be found uncultivated, and the greater the neglect of agriculture and of every industrial operation. That is, farmers who have still any capital left, instead of taking up a part of the pauper labour in the cultivation of their lands, are selling whatever property they possess, deserting their holdings, and flying from the country. The proprietary are generally allowing even the grass farms thrown on their hands to lie waste; and thus, as destitution is arriving at its maximum, the sources whence the funds for its relief are to be derived, are drying up.

We do not mean to advocate that the Poor-law Guardians should undertake the farming of the distressed districts—should employ the paupers in their cultivation, and support them out of the proceeds.

The healthful exercise of the inmates—the agricultural instruction afforded to the children, added to the profit which might be derived, would, in our opinion, justify the attaching a farm of convenient size to each workhouse. Even the old and the infirm could assist, and would delight in the occupation the culture of a garden would supply them; and it would be much better they should be so employed than spend their hours of recreation (as they are called) moping about cold day rooms, or seeking in some nook to enjoy the warmth of a beam of sunshine. However, though we thus approve of farming by pauper labour, to this small extent, we would not divert labour generally from its legitimate application—the profitable employment of the labourer for the benefit of the employer.

Whatever may be the ultimate—the proximate cause of the state of things now existing, and likely to continue in the distressed districts—is to be found in excessive local taxation. Where the taxes amount, or where there is a prospect of their amounting, to the full value of the property, it is not the interest even of the proprietor himself to expend his capital—and there is very little likelihood of his engaging any other person to expend his—in giving employment. Actions for recovery of poor-rate, or proceedings by mortgagees to sell, are alike innocuous to property situated in this way. It is useless appointing a receiver over a waste, or bringing a valueless, or worse than valueless, property into the market. No contraction of the area of taxation, no rendering individual property liable for the support of its own poor, would meet the evil of a case like this. Interest, and interest alone, must be relied on, to urge men to exertion, and it is clear there can be no advantage in cultivating a country where the taxes are above 20s. in the £1.

If excessive local taxation be the real cause of the desertion of the farmer, and the ruin of the proprietary, in the distressed districts of Ireland, the remedy must be sought, not in contracting, but in extending the area of taxation. A tax for the relief of the poor—extending over the whole surface of Ireland, and affecting every species of property, would at first reduce the value of property in the more favoured portions of it, but by increasing its value in the distressed districts, and thus making it the interest of capitalists to purchase estates there, and give employment, would eventually conduce to the general benefit of the country.

A general tax of this kind, affecting every species of property, would, in all likelihood, be of small amount. The rate—as destitution in the distressed districts diminished—would decrease from year to year; while any system of taxation which increased the burthen on localities, exactly in proportion to their inability to bear them, (and which objection is applicable to all schemes having the diminution of the area of taxation for their base,) by virtually throwing out of cultivation large portions of the country, would have a tendency to increase, from year to year, that part of the taxation which affected the country at large. And—as large districts are unequal to the support of their own poor—on any system, a portion of the tax must be made general. In fact, were the tax a general one, the distressed districts would have a tendency to assist in the support of their own destitution—a tendency which would go on increasing from year to year; whilst, were the tax partly local and partly general, the distressed districts would have a contrary tendency, and throw the entire onus of their destitution on the more favoured portions of the country.

A serious obstacle to the improvement of the country, also exists in the number and extent of incumbrancers and incumbered estates. The taxation of mortgagees would perhaps have more effect in dissolving these compounds, than the operation of the Incumbered Estates Bill; whilst making the tax for relief general, would render valuable this species of property, which, if taxation remain confined to localities, will be altogether worthless in the distressed districts.

The effect also on the labour market would be beneficial. A proprietor, limited to the employment of a certain set of paupers chained to his estate, and whom, in any event, he must support, would have many difficulties to contend with in carrying out farming operations, while able-bodied paupers, willing to work, in an electoral division—where the proprietor either could not or would not give employment—must necessarily remain unprofitable to the community. Allowing the employer to seek for labourers where he pleased, and the labourer to find employment where he could, and wages in proportion to his worth, would be much more for the advantage of the employer and the employed.

In fine, there are numerous and extensive properties in the distressed districts whose proprietors can neither give employment, nor pay poor-rate; properties they cannot sell, as no one will purchase them, liable to the present excessive taxation. On these estates there are large populations, which, if the localities are not enabled to assist in supporting, must be supported entirely by a general tax, as the law will not allow them to die of starvation. To enable these properties to assist in the support of their own destitution, there is but the one means, namely, to reduce the taxation, which now deters every one from undertaking their profitable cultivation.

In our last number, we laid before our readers the substance of the "Declinatory Plea," the validity of which had been discussed in the cases of Smith O'Brien and others v. the Queen in error. We then stated some of the arguments for and against that plea upon the merits, and referred to the statutory enactments upon which it had been framed. We now propose to state shortly the objections in point of form (two in number) taken to the plea in question by the crown, as well as the replies to those objections given on the part of the prisoners. Before proceeding to do so, we shall, for the convenience of reference, transcribe the very words of the plea, as put in on behalf of Smith O'Brien, which, mutatis mutandis, was the same as that put in on the part of the other prisoners. They were as follows:—"He, the said William Smith O'Brien, protesting that he is not guilty thereof," (i. e. the treasons charged by the indictment) "or of any part thereof, nevertheless says that he ought not now to be compelled to answer the same, because he says that by the indictment aforesaid, he, the said W. S. O'Brien, is charged and indicted for, among other offences, compassing, imagining, and intending to put our lady the Queen to death, and that by the statutable enactments in that case made and provided, and now in force in this realm, every person indicted for compassing, imagining, and intending death or destruction to our lady the Queen, is entitled to have delivered to him before the trial, and in presence of two or more credible witnesses, a copy of the indictment, and at the same time a list of the witnesses to be produced on the trial for proving the said indictment, mentioning the names, professions, and place of abode of the witnesses, and also a copy of the panel of the jurors that are to try him on the said indictment; and the said Wm. S. O'Brien says, that on the indictment aforesaid was found a true bill by the jurors aforesaid, on Thursday, the 21st day of September last, and that on the said Thursday, the 21st day of September last, a copy of the said indictment was delivered to him, the said Wm. S. O'Brien, in open court, but no copy of the panel of the jurors that are to try him on said indictment, nor any list of witnesses to be produced on the trial for proving the said indictment, was there or at any time delivered to him, the said W. S. O'Brien, and this the said W. S. O'Brien is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment, and that he may not be compelled to answer the said indictment, and so forth." It is to be observed, that the the foregoing plea was pleaded to an indictment which contained six counts, five whereof charged a treason—namely, that of levying war—on the trial for which,—if disconnected from the charge of treason, of compassing the death of the Queen,—the prisoners would admittedly have no claim to the privileges in question, and that it was only upon the insertion of the sixth count, charging such compassing, that the counsel for the prisoners rested the validity of the plea.

The two formal objections taken by the crown were, first, "That the facts stated therein were not proper subject matter of a plea, that they were matters properly belonging to the practice of the court where the trial was had, and that the only course open to the prisoners, whereby they could have advantage of the omissions (if omissions they were) was by motion to the Judges then presiding, to stay the trial until such omissions had been supplied, and that the decision of said Judges thereon should be final and conclusive."

Second. It was urged by the crown that the plea was informal, as purporting to be pleaded to the whole indictment, whereas it should have been confined to the sixth count, which alone charged the prisoners with compassing the death of the Queen.

To the first objection it was replied, that the rights claimed by the prisoner's plea were not like those resulting from the rules and practice of a court of justice, framed with a view to the regularity of its proceedings and the convenience of suitors,—that they were rights conferred by statute for the protection of the subject,—that the law which conferred the rights could not have intended that their enjoyment should depend on the decision (of necessity, often times hasty and ill-considered) of a motion by a Judge of assize, and that the prisoners were entitled to put the question at issue upon the record, by way of plea, in order to have it solemnly argued before a court of error, in case they were dissatisfied with the decision of the court below. The law of Scotland, where analogous privileges have been, by various statutes, conferred upon the accused, and where the denial of such privileges has been frequently pleaded, was cited as an authority in favour of the foregoing view, and Hume's Criminal Law of Scotland, 2nd vol. p. 247, was referred to.

To the second objection it was answered, that a party could not legally be called upon to answer at several times to different parts of the same indictment; that if a declinatory plea (that is a plea declining to answer) was good as to any one count, it followed that it was good as to all; that if it were otherwise, the prisoner might be put on his trial on the same indictment at different times, as to five of the counts at one time, and as to the sixth so soon as the statutable requisitions had been complied with; a consequence, it was argued, which shewed, that if any part of the indictment was open to the declinatory plea, so must the whole. The plea in the present case was further likened to a plea stating a demand and refusal of oyer of a deed in a civil case, which, though the deed may have been set out in only one count of the declaration, is a good declinatory plea to all the counts, and the case of Longmille v. The Inhabitants of Thistleworth, (2 Lord Raym. 969) was cited.

We shall conclude this article with a statement of the error assigned with reference to the caption of the indictment. As the argument on this point involved chiefly minute verbal criticism, we shall set out the caption in full, from a perusal of which, and a reference to the words in italics, our readers may at once apprehend the objection taken by the prisoners. The caption is as follows: "Be it remembered that at a special session of Oyer and Terminer, and general gaol delivery, holden in, and for the county of Tipperary, at Clonmel, in said county, on Thursday the 21st day of Sept., in the twelfth year of our sovereign lady Queen Victoria, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, defender of the faith, and so forth, and in the year of our Lord, 1848, before the Rt. Hon. Francis Blackburne, Chief Justice of her Majesty's court of Chief Place in Ireland, the Rt. Hon. John Doherty, Chief Justice of her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, and the Rt. Hon. Richard Moore, fourth justice of her Majesty's Court of Chief Place in Ireland, and commissioners of our said lady the Queen of Oyer and Terminer, within her said county of Tipperary, nominated and appointed to hear and determine all and all manner of treasons, &c., by whomsoever done, committed, or perpetrated, in said county of Tipperary, as well against the peace and the common law of Ireland, as against the form and effect of any statute made, &c., and also nominated and appointed from time to time as need should be, to deliver the gaols of our said lady the Queen, by virtue of a commission under letters patent of our said lady the Queen, bearing date the 1st day of September, in the twelfth year of the reign of our said lady the Queen, to them, the said F. Blackburne, J. Doherty, and R. Moore, and others, in the said letters named directed, by the oaths of, &c., it is presented, &c."

The objection, founded on the foregoing caption, on the part of the prisoners was, that it appeared from the concluding words that the commission to try the prisoners was directed to F. Blackburne, John Doherty, Richard Moore, and others, that it does not appear that the three commissioners before whom the trial was had, formed a quorum, that as that authority appeared to be conferred on them jointly with others, they had no power to try prisoners in the absence of those others, and that therefore, as appeared from the caption, the trial was had coram non iudice,

The crown replied that the words nominated and appointed, which occur in the earlier part of the caption, meant, and with propriety of language, could be held only to mean, "with full authority, and in the absence of all others." That those words conveyed all that the quorum clause in ordinary commissions did, and that if the letters patent had conferred only a joint authority upon the said three commissioners and others, it would have been false in fact to have said that the said Francis Blackburne, John Doherty, and Richard Moore, had been nominated and appointed to hear and determine, &c.

CAP. XXXII.

An Act to facilitate the collection of County Cess in Ireland.
[22nd July, 1848.]

- Sec. 1. In case Collectors cannot be procured for an entire Barony, Grand Jury at Summer Assizes of this year, or Magistrates at Special Sessions after them, may appoint Collectors for Districts.
2. When Grand Jury at Assizes shall not have appointed Collectors of Cess, Quarter Sessions or Special Sessions may appoint before the Spring Assizes. Persons appointed to give Security.
3. Collector shall pay his Collection monthly to the County Bank, or as soon as he has received 100l.
4. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas by the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 116, it is provided, that the grand jury of each county in Ireland shall, at each assizes, appoint a high constable and collector for each barony, to collect all monies presented on such barony, or a county of a city, or county of a town, in manner therein 'specified: and whereas, by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 26, it is provided, that in case the grand jury at assizes shall not have appointed a high constable or collector of cess, or a vacancy shall have occurred in such office in certain cases, the justices of the peace of any county, at any general quarter sessions of the peace or adjournment thereof, or at a special sessions may appoint a collector of any barony: and whereas in some cases it may happen that a duly qualified person cannot be found to undertake the collection of a barony: be it therefore enacted, that in case it shall appear to the grand jury of any county assembled at the summer assizes of this present year, or to the magistrates assembled at a special sessions of the peace, as herein-after directed, that a collector cannot be procured to collect for an entire barony, then such grand jury, or the magistrates at such special sessions may appoint persons for such districts as to them may seem fit, provided that such districts together comprise the whole barony.

2. That in every case in which any grand jury at such summer assizes shall not have appointed a high constable or collector of cess for any barony of such county, or if any vacancy shall occur or exist after such assizes and before the first day of the next ensuing assizes, the justices of the peace of the said county at any general quarter sessions of the peace or adjournment thereof, or at a special sessions of the peace to be called by the clerk of the peace in two days after the receipt of the written requisition of the treasurer, at the county assizes or sessions town of the division in which such barony is situate, (giving six days notice thereof to such justices resident in such division,) may appoint a collector of cess for any district of any barony of such county for which no such high constable or collector shall have been appointed at the assizes by the grand jury, or for which such vacancy shall occur or exist, as the case may be; and any such person so appointed may give such security as aforesaid before such justices in like manner as directed by the said recited acts or either of them; and in case any person appointed as aforesaid by the grand jury at the assizes shall not have given security before such grand jury as by the said first-recited act required, such person so appointed may give such security before the justices of the peace of such county at the next general or quarter sessions of the peace for the division of the county in which such barony is situate, or at any special sessions; or in default thereof such justices, at any general or quarter sessions of the peace or adjournment thereof for such county, or at such special sessions as aforesaid may appoint some other person collector for any district of such barony or place in lieu of the person so appointed by the grand jury; and the person so appointed by such justices may give security before such justices at such sessions as if the same were given at the assizes before the grand jury; and all the provisions of the said recited act, or any act amending the same, or of any other act relating to any such high constables or collectors of cess, shall be extended to any collector of cess appointed and giving security, or only giving security as aforesaid under this act, as fully as if he were a high constable or collector of cess appointed by and giving security before the grand jury at the assizes under the said recited act; and the warrant of the treasurer of such county issued to the collector of each such district (which warrant such treasurer is hereby authorized and required to issue) shall be of the same validity as if issued to a high constable or collector appointed under the said recited acts or either of them.

3. That any person authorized to collect the grand jury cess under this act shall, on or before the first day of every month, or so often as he shall receive one hundred pounds, pay into the county bank, to the credit of the treasurer of the county, the sums he may have received up to such period, and shall furnish to the treasurer of the county an account of the sums so received and paid in.

4. That this Act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. XXXIII.

An Act to apply the sum of three millions out of the consolidated fund, to the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and forty eight. [22nd July, 1848.]

CAP. XXXIV.

An Act to amend certain acts in force in Ireland in relation to appeals from decrees and dismissals on civil bills in the county of Dublin and county of the city of Dublin.
[22d July, 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Appeals from civil bill decrees and dismissals in the county and city of Dublin to be heard in the vacation after every term, with power of adjournment for special reasons. Notice of appeal.
2. Computation of time.
3. Interpretation of terms.
4. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by certain acts of parliament in Ireland provision is made for enabling any person aggrieved by a decree or dismissal of the Recorder of Dublin upon any civil bill, or by a decree, dismissal, or order of the chairman of the county of Dublin, or by the decrees of any seneschal or steward of any manor court within the county of Dublin or county of the city of Dublin, to appeal from such decree, dismissal, or order to the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench or Common Pleas, or to the Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, or other justice of Nisi Prius, at their sittings at Nisi Prius for the city of Dublin, after the Easter or Michaelmas term next following the pronouncing of such decree, dismissal, or order, under certain regulations, one of which is that the party so appealing shall give twenty days previous notice in writing to the party obtaining such decree, dismissal, or order, or to his attorney, to which of the said judges such appeal is intended to be made: and whereas, in order as well to expedite such appeals as to distribute more equally among the vacations succeeding the law terms the business of hearing same, it is expedient to amend the said acts by making such provision in relation to the said appeals as herein-after mentioned: be it enacted, that after the passing of this act every appeal from any decree, dismissal, or order on any civil bill of the Recorder of Dublin, or of the chairman of the county of Dublin, or of any seneschal or steward of any manor court within the county of Dublin or county of the city of Dublin, or having jurisdiction within both the county of Dublin and county of the city of Dublin, shall be made to the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, or of the Common Pleas, or to the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer or other justice at Nisi Prius to try records issuing out of such court, in the vacation next following the term which shall end on or next after the expiration of fourteen days from the day of the making of such decree, &c. and such appeal may be heard by such Chief Justice, &c. at any time after the last day of such term, and before the first day of the next ensuing term, and either before or after the sittings at Nisi Prius in such vacation, with power to such Chief Justice, &c. to adjourn the hearing of any such appeal to any time in or after the subsequent term, if, for special reasons to be stated in the decree, &c. which shall be made upon such appeal, he shall deem it proper so to do; and instead of twenty days notice of appeal, now required by law, the party appealing shall give to the party who shall have obtained such decree, &c. or to his attorney, ten days (at the least) previous to the commencement of the vacation next following the term which shall so end on or next after the expiration of fourteen days from the day of the making or pronouncing of such decree, &c. notice in writing, apprising such party who shall have obtained such decree, &c. or his attorney, to which of the said judges such appeal is intended to be made; and such appeal, and all proceedings in relation thereto, shall be heard, conducted, and observed in every respect, save as otherwise provided by this act, in such manner, and subject to such rules, and regulations, as now required in case of appeal from any such decree, &c.

2. That in computing the periods of fourteen days and ten days the same shall be reckoned respectively inclusive of the day of the pronouncing of such decree, &c. and of the day of the giving of such notice, but exclusive of the day on which such vacation shall commence.

3. That in the construction of this act the word "party" shall include any corporation sole or aggregate; and that all words importing the singular number or masculine gender, shall be construed to extend to and include many persons as well as one person, and females as well as males.

4. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of Parliament.

CAP. XXXV.

An Act to empower the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland to apprehend, and detain until the first day of March one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, such persons as he or they shall suspect of conspiring against her Majesty's person and government.
[25th July, 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Persons imprisoned in Ireland for high treason, &c. may be detained till the 1st March 1849, and shall not be bailed or tried without an order from the privy council.
2. Persons to whom warrants of commitment are directed shall detain the persons so committed in safe custody. Persons charged with custody, as also place of detention, may be changed by warrant as herein mentioned.
3. Copies of warrants to be transmitted to the clerk of the crown for Dublin.

Whereas a treasonable and rebellious spirit of insurrection now unfortunately exists in Ireland: therefore, for the better preservation of her Majesty's most sacred person, and for securing the peace, laws, and liberties of this kingdom, be it enacted, that every person who is, within prison in Ireland on the day this act shall receive her Majesty's royal assent, or after, by warrant of her Majesty's privy council of Ireland, signed by six of the said privy council, for high treason or treasonable practices, or suspicion of high treason or treasonable practices, or by a warrant signed by the Lord Lieutenant or his chief secretary, for such causes as aforesaid, may be detained in custody without bail or mainprize until the first day of March, 1849, and that no judge or justice of the peace shall bail or try any such person so committed without an order from her said Majesty's privy council until the first day of March, 1849, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. In cases where any persons have been before the passing of this act, or shall be during the time this act shall continue in force, arrested, or detained in custody by warrants of her Majesty's privy council of Ireland, signed by six of the said privy council, for high treason or treasonable practices, or suspicion of high treason or treasonable practices, or by warrants signed by the Lord Lieutenant or his chief secretary, for such causes as aforesaid, any person to whom such warrant have been or shall be directed may detain such persons so arrested or committed in custody in any place whatever within Ireland, and such persons to whom such warrants have been or shall be directed shall be deemed to be lawfully authorized to detain in safe custody, and to be the lawful gaolers and keepers of such persons so arrested, and that such places where such persons so arrested, are or shall be detained in custody shall be deemed to be lawful prisons and gaols for the detention of such persons respectively; and the Lord Lieutenant, by warrant signed by him or the chief secretary of such Lord Lieutenant or by warrant signed by him, or her Majesty's privy council of Ireland, by warrant signed by six of the privy council, may from time to time, change the persons by whom and the place in which such persons shall be detained in safe custody.

3. Provided, that copies of such warrants shall be transmitted to the clerk of the crown in and for the county of the city of Dublin, and shall be filed by him in the public office of the Pleas of the crown in the city of Dublin.

CAP. XXXVI.

An Act for the amendment of the law of entail in Scotland.
[14th August, 1848.]

CAP. XXXVII.

An Act to amend the law relative to the assignment of Ecclesiastical Districts.
[14th August, 1848.]

CAP. XXXVIII.

An Act to authorize the West India Relief Commissioners to grant further time for the repayment of monies advanced by them in certain cases.
[14th August, 1848.]

CAP. XXXIX.

An Act to facilitate the raising of Money by Corporate Bodies for building or repairing Prisons.

Sec. 1. Clauses in 10 & 11 Vict. c. 16, respecting Mortgages extended to this act.

2. Matters to be done by the Commissioners and their Clerk may be done by Council and Town Clerk.

3. Mortgages may enforce payment of Arrears by Receivers.

4. 10 & 11 Vict. c. 16, s. 84, as to Sinking Fund not to apply to this act.

5. Money raised to pay off prior Loans to be paid off within the original period of 30 years.

6. Sinking Fund to be provided.

7. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, intituled An Act to amend the laws concerning Prisons, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of boroughs in which there shall be a separate Court of Sessions of the Peace, are empowered by their councils to borrow money for building or enlarging any prison, court house, or other buildings used therewith, and to secure the repayment thereof: and greater facilities should be given for raising and repaying such monies: and 'The Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847,' contains clauses with respect to mortgages executed by the commissioners, and such clauses should apply to mortgages and bonds by councils of boroughs under the said act relating to prisons: Be it enacted, that the several clauses in the said 'Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847,' with respect to mortgages executed by the commissioners, save as to the provisions thereof inconsistent with this act, and save as hereinafter excepted, shall be incorporated with this act, and be applicable to all mortgages or bonds granted under the commission seal of any borough by virtue of the said recited act 'to amend the laws concerning Prisons.'

2. That every thing which by 'The Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847,' is provided or required, and all powers exercised by the commissioners respecting mortgages of rates or other property, may be lawfully done by the council of any such borough with respect to monies raised under the said recited act, 'to amend the laws respecting prisons: and every thing by the said 'Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847,' required to be done in relation to the borrowing monies by the clerk to the commissioners, may be lawfully done by the town clerk of any such borough.

3. That the mortgages or bondholders of the corporation may enforce payment of the arrears of interest, or principal and interest by a receiver, as directed by the said 'Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847.'

4. That the 84th clause in the said 'Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847,' which provides for the repayment of monies borrowed by a sinking fund shall not be incorporated with this act.

5. That if the council shall borrow any money at a lower rate of interest than by securities given by them and then is force shall bear, the money so borrowed shall be paid off within thirty years, from the time when the money paid off was originally borrowed.

6. That to discharge the principal money borrowed, which the said council are required to pay off within thirty years, the council shall every year set apart a sum equal to six pounds ten shillings per centum on the amount borrowed and apply same, after payment thereof of the interest, as a sinking fund in paying off principal monies, and shall invest same in the purchase of Exchequer bills or other government securities, to be increased by accumulation, until the same shall be sufficient to pay off the principal debts to which same shall be applicable, or some part thereof, when same or part thereof shall be applied in paying off such principal debts as mentioned in the said 'Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847.'

7. That this act may be amended or repealed.

CAP. XL.

An Act to alter the mode of assessing the funds leviable in the county of Inverness, for making and maintaining certain Roads and Bridges and other works in the Highlands of Scotland. [14th August, 1848.]

CAP. XLI.

An Act to amend the laws relating to the Ecclesiastical Unions and Divisions of Parishes in Ireland.

Sec. 1. So much of the recited acts as relates to or requires the consent of Patrons, repealed.

2. Plans of proposed Divisions or Unions of Parishes to be lodged in Privy Council Office, approved by Archbishop, &c., and copies to be served on Patrons; Lord Lieutenant and Council to consider such plans and the objections of Patrons, and may confirm or alter the proposed plans.

3. Churches may be erected within districts to be formed from portions of parishes in different dioceses.

4. Bounds of districts to be notified to Incumbents and to the Lord Lieutenant in Council.

5. Bishops to exercise jurisdiction over districts, Incumbents, &c. Nothing to render Incumbent subject to any other Bishop.

6. Providing for exchange of Glebe Lands of disunited Parishes.

7. Provisions of recited Acts applicable to districts formed under this Act.

8. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by the 7 & 8 G. 4, c. 43, being An Act to amend the laws in Ireland for divisions of parishes, and for uniting parts of parishes, and for erecting chapels of ease, and making perpetual cures, it is enacted, "that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with the assent of the major part of the privy council, six at least consenting, and with the approbation of the archbishop of the province and the bishop of the diocese, certified under their hands and seals, attested by two or more witnesses, to divide old parishes, or to separate any parish, and to unite parishes and to erect same into new parishes;" and whereas it is also enacted, "that when churches or parishes shall be united, having had distinct patrons, the Lord Lieutenant and council as aforesaid, with the approbation of the archbishop and bishop in whose province and diocese the churches were situate, shall divide the patronage among the patrons, according to the yearly value of the parish whereof they are patrons, the consent of each patron being first had and entered in the instrument for erecting the said union; and such settlement shall be final and binding to all patrons, and all parties for ever, reserving unto every archbishop and bishop, registrars and schoolmasters, their dues out of every parish so united: provided that when the King is entitled to the presentation of any churches so to be united, he shall, after such union, upon the first vacancy, have the first presentation to such united church, and afterwards, upon the next vacancy, the other patrons, as the Lord Lieutenant and council shall direct:" and whereas by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 54, it is enacted, that where churches or parishes shall be united, the Lord Lieutenant may with the assent and advice and approbation aforesaid, certified as aforesaid with the consent of each patron, affected by the creation of such union, (first had and entered in the instrument for erecting the said union,) make such a settlement of the patronage of such union or parish, as in his opinion the case shall require; and same shall be final, reserving unto every archbishop and bishop, registrar and schoolmaster, their dues: provided, that when the consent of the Queen, is to be given to any such settlement, or to making any union, the consent of the Lord Lieutenant shall be as good and valid: and greater facilities should be afforded for the union and division of parishes in the settlement of the patronage: be it enacted, that after the passing of this act so much of the before-recited acts as requires the consent of patrons is hereby repealed.

2. That after the passing of this act, when any such division or union, is to be effected, an instrument containing the plan for the division or union, marked and coloured on a sheet of the ordnance survey of Ireland in which such parish or part of a parish is situate, and annexed to such instrument, and also for the settlement of the patronage of all the parishes and unions altered or created, and having endorsed upon same the approbation of the archbishop having jurisdiction in the provinces in which same are situate, and of every archbishop, bishop, or persons entitled to episcopal jurisdiction in the said parishes and unions, as dioceses thereof, certified as aforesaid, shall be lodged in the council office in Dublin castle, and a copy of same sent to each of the patrons, &c. whose consent is necessary to the proposed division or union, and with same a notice in writing shall be served upon the parties last aforesaid, calling upon them, within six weeks after the service of same, to lodge in the council office in Dublin castle a statement in writing of their objections, to the said instrument, or to the settlement of patronage; and at the expiration of six weeks from the service of the last notice, the Lord Lieutenant and privy council, (six of the said privy council at least consenting, of whom two at least shall be members of the judicial bench in Ireland;) may confirm said instrument, and the union or division, and the settlement of patronage therein made, and make an order reciting the said instrument as lodged in the council office, and confirming same; or if upon consideration, such Lord Lieutenant and privy council should be of opinion that the same ought to be altered such alteration may be made by them, and the instrument so altered shall be returned to the bishops or archbishops by whom it was approved; and if said instrument so altered be sent back to the council office, with their approbation endorsed thereon, such Lord Lieutenant and privy council, (as before, six at least consenting,) may make an order in council reciting the instrument as so altered by the Lord Lieutenant, and approved of by the bishops or archbishops as aforesaid and confirming same; and such order in council, whether confirming the original instrument or the instrument so altered shall be as valid as if the consent of such patrons, &c. had been given in the manner prescribed in the said recited acts, and the said union or division duly completed thereunder: provided, that at the meeting of the privy council for the consideration of the said instrument, and objections thereto, any of the parties objecting, on giving three days notice to the clerk of the privy council, may be heard before such privy council by their counsel or agents.

3. And whereas in the said first-recited act it was enacted that the several archbishops and bishops of Ireland, and their successors, within their dioceses, might erect new churches in districts to be formed from contiguous portions of adjoining parishes, as to said archbishops and bishops should seem proper: and whereas the said act did not provide for the forming of such districts from contiguous portions of adjoining parishes in different dioceses, for which 'it may be convenient to provide;' be it enacted, that any of the archbishops and bishops of Ireland and their successors, or persons having episcopal jurisdiction in contiguous dioceses, may erect new churches or chapels within districts to be formed from contiguous portions of two or more adjoining parishes in different dioceses, as to the said archbishops and bishops and their successors shall seem proper.

4. That the bounds for such districts shall be ascertained by writing under the hands and archiepiscopal and episcopal seals, of the archbishop and bishop or concurring in the formation of such districts; and such writing shall set out the bounds and several townlands comprised within any such district, and marked and coloured on a sheet of the ordnance survey of Ireland, and annexed to such instrument in like manner as herein-before mentioned, and shall be transmitted to the several incumbents and to the Lord Lieutenant in council for the purposes specified in the said act herein-before recited in respect to districts formed in the same diocese, and shall be entered in the registry of every diocese in which such newly created district shall be situated, and shall be enrolled in manner in said act set forth, upon payments to be made upon such entry and enrolment as therein mentioned.

In preceding numbers, we gave an account of several of the operations of the present poor law, and pointed out imperfections, as well in the enactments themselves as in the machinery adopted for carrying them out,—errors in the valuation, which would disgrace the blotter of a common surveyor,—wholesale mistakes in the rate-books, which are, nevertheless, regarded as infallible,—difficulties, sometimes insurmountable, in appealing against the rate, and frequent injustices in the collection of it.

We pointed out, also, means by which these imperfections might be obviated,—by adopting the accurate valuation by the Ordinance, in place of the crude and unsatisfactory one under the poor law,—attaching the townland sheets of the Ordinance survey to the rate-books, the separate holdings being so distinguished and numbered as to admit of an easy reference from one to the other, and giving a right of appeal for a reasonable time after application for payment, and not, as at present, after the striking of the rate.

We have gone farther—though, perhaps, in so doing we verged on the limits prescribed to this journal—we could not confine ourselves to the bare criticism of the wording of an act of Parliament,—to the mere detection of error in valuations, or mistakes in rate-books,—when we saw vital objections to the whole principle on which the taxation was founded. Irishmen are constantly taunted with finding faults, without suggesting remedies, and we, being compelled to find fault with the present system of local taxation, felt constrained to suggest a practical remedy. We have suggested one,—a general rate extending over all Ireland, and to every species of property, for the support of the poor; one which, in our opinion, would rescue the country from its present disastrous position.

Before entering into further proof of the necessity, practicability, and expediency of the means we have proposed, we cannot dismiss our discussion on the details of the present enactments, without noticing some remaining salient defects; and shall now apply ourselves to the inequality with which the rating under the poor law presses on different classes of property. The 79th sec. of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, contains a proviso “that no deduction shall be made from any rent-charge granted by way of jointure, or any other rent-charge or annuity granted, limited, or devised, for a life or lives, in being only, or for years determinable on a life in being.”

The exemptions contained in this section, seem founded on no just principle; at least, we can see no valid reason why the landowner, who, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is tenant for life, should be compelled to bear all the burden, when the life-annuitant is freed from it. The duration of both estates is the same, why not the liabilities? To test the hardship of imposing the whole tax on the proprietor, let us take the following example, which comes within our own knowledge. The owner in fee of a property producing £600 per annum, grants a perpetual rent-charge thereof of £400 per annum, limited to his eldest son for life, remainder to trustees to the use of that son's issue, and subsequently conveys the estate, subject to the second son. Then comes the poor law, taxing—during rent-charge, and a life-interest for himself, to his life of the eldest son, who has two-thirds of the income—the remaining one-third, with the rate upon the whole. Now, here the quantity of the estates is the same, and the value of the son's interest—being a younger life—greater than that of his father, and yet the entire charge is cast on the shoulders of him least able to bear it. The effect of this distinction between these two life estates is in manifest contradiction to the intention of the family settlement, to justice, and to the principle on which the taxation under the poor-law is generally distributed.

It is, therefore, obvious, that for all cases similarly circumstanced, this proviso of the section cited should be repealed.

Again, mortgagees, and all other incumbrancers, including those in the section cited—the owners of perpetual unredeemable charges alone excepted—are exempt from any deduction for poor-rate. Now, when it is remembered to what an extent Irish property is incumbered, some idea may be formed of the vastness of this immunity from taxation, and the disproportionate burthen thrown on the landed proprietor. To say that three-fourths of the received rental of Ireland is absorbed in the payment of incumbrancers, would be to under estimate the amount so applied; and it seems impossible to give reasons to justify the exemption of this vast class—“fruges consumeris nati”—from contributing to the poor-rate.

Indeed it has not been attempted except in the case of redeemable charges, such as mortgages, in which, it is contended, that taxing these securities would throw an undue supply of land into the market, every creditor being anxious to call in his loan.

But, in the first place, this result would not follow, because, by taxing funded, and every other species of property, there would be no advantage gained by a transfer of capital from one taxed security to another; and secondly, if it did follow, it would be an advantage to the country at large, whose prosperity is retarded by nothing more than the existence of incumbered estates, which, with the powerful auxiliary supplied by the Incumbered Estates Act, would be brought into the market with a clear title, to be transferred from their embarrassed proprietors to a more solvent class.

Funded property is likewise exempted, and this, in all likelihood, arose from the difficulty of fixing the per centage it should bear for poor-rate under the present system of local taxation; but, as already adverted to, by rendering this species of property liable to poor-rate, the objection—if it be an objection—to taxing mortgagees and other creditors would be obviated, and there would be no difficulty in estimating the amount of contribution if the tax were a general one.

Nor should the enhanced value that land would acquire by the imposition of a general tax be overlooked; as it is obvious that the removal of a portion of the burden under which it is now sunk, would tend much to augment its value, and general taxation, by diminishing the desirableness of loans, would promote the investment of capital in land; in other words, sales, and not loans, would be promoted, and this is a national object of incalculable importance.

The foregoing observations manifest the inequality of the imposition of the tax, and exhibit the injustice of exempting the most solvent descriptions of property from contributing to it.

Burdening the income of a clergyman by double the ordinary rate, is an instance of an injustice of the opposite kind, and deserves especial notice, as the second rate, thus imposed, is not for the benefit of the poor, but of the proprietor liable to pay tithe rent-charge, and this double deduction is made on the gross income of the clergyman, which never represents the true, being subject to large reductions, in the way of payment to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and to other charges.

It is observable also, that the machinery for the collection of the poor-rate would not be rendered in the least more complicated or expensive, by rendering the several charges on landed and other property liable to it; the primary liability might be left as at present, and an enactment enabling the person liable to any annual charge to deduct the rate from every pound in such annual charge, in the same way as a tenant deducts the landlord's proportion when paying his rent, would be sufficient in every case, except that of funded property, and here the tax could be deducted in the same way as the income tax now is.

The difficulty of adjusting the proportion the incumbrancer should pay, whilst the rate varied from place to place, even over different parts of the same property, may have hitherto been a reason for dispensing with deductions from these classes of income, but will be no longer applicable should a general rate be adopted.

The principle that land, and land only, should be chargeable with the support of destitution, implies that all poverty is rural, but this position is not sound, and, even if it were, now that the land, from an unforeseen and unaccountable visitation of Providence, has ceased to yield her strength, it seems in the highest degree inequitable to charge even the support of rural pauperism exclusively on land, and even that the present law does not do, but throws this support on the weakest portion of the population deriving a subsistence and an income from land.

Farmers, who are the producers, and landlords who, though nominally the proprietors, are frequently the ill-paid agents of their own estates, have been placed in the brunt of the battle, whilst incumbrancers—those hungry absorbents of the marrow of the soil—have escaped both the sight of destitution, and the legal necessity of contributing to its relief.

Assuming that we have proved our point—that the present imposition of poor-rate is unequal, and that the tax should be levied from every species of property, we proceed once more to enforce our views, that the best remedy for existing distress, and only safeguard against supervening calamity, will be the imposition of a general tax. We may go further, and say that it is the only remedy that Ireland can apply.

We have objected to local taxation, because, in the distressed districts, it would not supply sufficient means for relieving destitution, and because it tends to throw land out of cultivation.

Undoubtedly there is much weight in the argument, that a local tax makes it the direct interest of the locality to be vigilant in lessening expenditure in the relief of the poor, and stimulates landholders and landowners to give employment; but this argument pre-supposes that each locality can support its own poor, and in the existing condition of Ireland is wholly untenable, as nearly one-half of the country is admittedly unequal to the support of the destitute. They must either be fed from other sources, or be left to perish of want.

These are the alternatives.

What are those other sources?

1. The national treasury.
2. Local taxation, confined to individual properties, with a rate in aid.
3. An equal general tax, levied off the whole island.

It would be a delusion to expect that Irish poverty is to be perennially fed with supplies from imperial sources. Except in periods of intense distress, such as the late famine, we must struggle on with our own resources. This source of supply may be considered as cut off, and the question of selection rests between the other two, and the last only can be depended upon; for, let us ask, over what extent is the rate in aid to be levied? Let us take, for instance, the province of Connaught; is there a large proprietor in that immense province who can say, give me my own poor, including infirm and able-bodied, and I will support them, and pay my proportion of the workhouse and union expenses. Suppose, there would be—and the supposition is a strong one—will that proprietor be able to bear a rate in aid for the support of his poorer neighbours? It is obvious that he could not, and that his property must sink into the general mass of destitution. If all Connaught cannot feed its own poor, would, could, or should Munster? Where, then, can you place the limit, short of the whole island? What imaginary boundary can you draw beyond which the rate in aid is not to be extended? If you studiously exclude the rich portions of the island from contributing to the rate in aid of poverty in the poorer districts, you deliberately consign their inhabitants to starvation. It is obvious that the principle of a local rate in aid is wholly inapplicable, and that the only alternative is a general tax.

It being established, then, that the rate in aid can only be limited by the extent of the island, the only question remains between local taxation, confined to individual estates, with a general tax, and a general tax without any reference to locality. This question, however, we must reserve to a future article.

There are few subjects of ordinary occurrence in legal practice which occasion greater difficulty to the practitioner, than to ascertain exactly the extent to which amendments of the record can be made at Nisi Prius. In a case argued before the Court of Exchequer, in Ireland, last Trinity Term (Doolan v. Laffan, June 15, 1848), the question arose on the following state of facts. The action was by the indorsee against the accommodation maker of a promissory note, made payable, in the body of the note, at a particular place. The declaration contained two special counts; the first averring special presentment, the other general. The plaintiff, having failed to prove presentment at the place mentioned in the first count, obtained leave, from the learned Judge who tried the case, to amend the record, by inserting an averment in the general count, that there "were no effects in the hands of the maker of the note," thereby rendering the proof of presentment unnecessary. On the motion for a new trial, the court gave no opinion on the amendment.

Tested by the language and intention of the statutes (9 Geo. 4, c. 15, and 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 48), and the decisions thereon, the correctness of this amendment seems more than doubtful.

The first of these statutes provided only for the amendment of variances between "any matter in writing, or in print, produced in evidence and the record;" so that the desired amendment must have been taken from the written instrument in evidence, by substituting the ipsissima verba for the passage misstated. Under the latter statute, if the legal effect only was intended to be stated, and mistaken, the mistake could be amended by introducing the true legal construction, provided that in neither case the amendment was material to the merits. Thus a guarantee declared on as addressed to the "plaintiff" alone, but which, in fact, was addressed to "the plaintiff, or person or persons, for the time being, carrying on the business," was held clearly a variance that might have been amended at Nisi Prius, Boyd v. Moyle (2 C. B. 644); and the same rule was laid down in Evans v. Fryer (10 Ad. 609); Whitwitt v. Scheer (8 Ad. & El. 801). But whilst the court will exercise a large degree of liberality in construing these statutes, there is no case to be found which decides that an averment can be introduced which would have the effect of changing the nature of the defence, the necessity for such averment having been obvious to the pleader. In Jelf v. Oriel (4 Car. & P. 22), Lord Tenterden refused to amend a declaration which stated a special acceptance at A. or at B., and the bill appeared to be accepted at B. only, saying, "It would only encourage want of care in drawing pleadings,—that the act (9 Geo. 4) was meant only to aid clerical mistakes, and not such as any man who could read would avoid making." These observations, though valuable as coming from the author of the statute, as a warning to the practitioner to avoid such misstatements, must be received with the qualification, that if the defence or plea be not altered by the amendment, the court will direct it to be made. The 9 Geo. 4 admittedly applies only to cases of variance between the written instrument declared on and that produced in evidence, Hanbury v. Ella (1 Ad. & El. 61); Gurfurd v. Bayley (3 M. & Gr. 781); Webb v. Hill, (3 Car. & P. 485); Masterman v. Judson, (8 Bing. 224). The 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 48, extends the principle of the former act, by empowering the Judge at Nisi Prius,—in cases where no written instrument exists,—to make amendments of a similar character to those allowed under the former statute; that is, if the unwritten subject matter of the action were reduced to writing, the amendment sought to be introduced should be found incorporated therein. Therefore, the rule laid down by Lord Tenterden in Jelf v. Oriel, and reiterated in the recent case of Bowers v. Nixon (2 Car. & Kir. 372) must also be adopted in the construction of this statute. In the last case referred to, in covenant on a lease, the declaration omitted to set out one of the penal rents reserved. Maule, J., says, "It appears to me that the enactments for allowing amendments at Nisi Prius were intended to meet variances arising from mere slips or accidents, and that they do not extend to a case like the present, in which the party has intentionally and designedly framed his pleading in a manner which gives rise to this objection. This being my opinion, and the allowance of amendments being entirely in the discretion of the Judge at Nisi Prius, I shall not allow an amendment in this case;" and the Court of Queen's Bench, after consideration, refused a rule for a new trial. If the true construction be, that "it shall be lawful for any court, &c., to amend when any variance shall appear between the proof and the verbal on the record of any contract, &c., or other matter, in any particular—in the judgment of the court—not material to the merits of the case," &c., the amendment in the principal case was going further than the statutes warranted. The averment could not have been introduced under the 9 Geo. 4, not being a portion of the written contract declared upon; nor under the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, which, if our view be correct, extended only to such amendments as we before adverted to; that is, when the averment introduced by the amendment could be found in the contract, or other cause of action; and, in this view, it is immaterial to discuss whether the amendment was material to the merits, or prejudicial to the defence. The words "other matter," which appear to have been relied on in the argument of the principal case, as conferring large powers of amendment, would seem to include causes of action ejusdem generis with those previously enumerated, such as actions not directly founded on written instruments, ejectment and replevin, which previously were not amendable under the 9 Geo. 4, as not professing to set out any written instrument, Ryder v. Malbon (3 Car. & P. 594), and not expressly named in the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105.

Before entering on an examination of the cases decided on these acts, we must call the attention of our readers to two very important distinctions in the practice of pleading in this country and in England, which must be kept in view; first, the allowance in England of but one count; secondly, the necessity of pleading specially, defences which in this country are admissible under the general issue, both of which will be seen to have an important effect on the law of amendment,—the first, by narrowing the plaintiff's statement, would, particularly with respect to instruments difficult of construction, place him at a considerable disadvantage if it were not for the very liberal construction the courts have given these statutes, a construction admittedly adopted to relieve plaintiffs from the difficulty alluded to, Smith v. Knowelden (2 Man. & Gr. 561), and for which the same reasons do not exist in this country, it being here in the plaintiff's power to state his case in as many forms as he pleases. The second is of consequence, in considering the rule established by the English authorities, that the amendment is improper where it admits of a plea different from that on the record, Garrett v. Handely (3 B. & Cr. 462); Brashier v. Jackson (6 M. & W. 554); Boucher v. Murray (6 Q. B. 362), as being prejudicial to the defence, a test not so easily applied in this country, where the matters of defence,—that must be pleaded specially in England,—are not only here less usual in practice, but would, in many instances, be improper, as amounting to the general issue.

We shall consider the cases on this subject in two classes, those in which the amendment sought was held not to be within the purview of the acts, and those in which the question, admitting the propriety of the amendment in other respects, was, whether it was in a particular immaterial to the merits, or whether the defence would be prejudiced thereby.

In the first class we find it established that the object of the statutes was, not to cure vicious pleadings, but to prevent non-suits from variances, Atkinson v. Raleigh, (3 Q. B. 85; 6 Jur. 731); to give the court the power of protecting a plaintiff, by amending an obvious mistake, Brown v. Dean, (2 Nev. & Man. 222, Denman, C. J.) and not to give either plaintiff, or defendant an opportunity of mending their hand, by introducing on the record either a cause of action, or a defence different from that first put forward; and on this principle, that if the record had in the first instance stated the cause of action in its amended form, and the other party had not been misled by his opponent's pleading, different issues might have been raised; when the question really is not whether there is a variance between the proof and the record, but whether the defect is in the declaration, amendments will not be allowed; as where the year of the demise was not stated in the declaration in ejectment. Doe v. Parsons, (8 M. & W. 158); see also David v. Preece, (5 Q. B. 440); Franklin v. E. of Falmouth, (6 Car. & P. 529); Doe v. Errington, (1 Ad. & El. 750, S. C.; 3 N. & Man. 646).

In the next place, supposing the amendment proper—as not introducing new matter, it then will be for consideration whether the variance be not in a particular material to the merits, or the amendment proposed prejudicial to the defence, as where the defendant would be thereby deprived of what would have been ground for a motion in arrest of judgment, Atkinson v. Raleigh, (5 Q. B. 79; 6 Jur. 731); or the pleading, as amended, would be demurrable. Evans v. Powis, (11 Jur. 1043). And the best test of the extent to which the particular amendment is prejudicial, is that before alluded to, namely, whether the same plea would be applicable before and after the amendment. In Sowhee v. Denny, (17 Law Jour. 171, Ex. N.S.) the words proved being different from those laid in the record, the court refused a new trial, saying, "the words as amended were actionable, but, that if the words inserted by amendment could have been answered by a plea of justification, and that the original words could not, the amendment would not have been proper;" and, in a similar case, Pater v. Baker, (11 Jur. 170; 16 Law Jour. 124, C.P.N.S.) Wilde, C. J., says the amendment must be allowed. "Any plea the defendant could have pleaded would have equally been an answer to both," i.e. the amended and original record, and the same rule is followed in Smith v. Knowelden, (2 Man. & Gr. 561). And, in all cases where the amendment required arises merely from a mis-statement of the cause, not a misconception of the right of action, the court will be very liberal in the exercise of this power, if it be not prejudicial to the merits. Sainsbury v.

Mathews, (4 M. & W. 343); Gusford v. Bayley, (3 Man. & Gr. 781); Hanbury v. Ella, (1 Ad. & El. 61); Evans v. Fryer, (10 Ad. & El. 609); Whitworth v. Scherr, (8 Ad. & El. 301); Boyd v. Moyle, (2 C. B. 632); Smith v. Brandram, (2 Scott, N.R. 539; 1 Nev. & Man. 332). In Edwards v. Leach, (3 Man. & Gr. 229,) the demise in the ejectment was on the 15th, the proof was of a right of entry on the 16th. This variance was amended, and on a motion for a new trial, Tindal, C. J. says—“There was a variance between the allegation in the lease and the proof, the amendment of which is clearly warranted by the statute. It is said, this is an improper interference with the admission of the defendant in the consent rule; on the amendment being made, the declaration is to be considered as having been always in its amended form, and the consent rule is to be taken as always applicable thereto. Coltman, J.—In many instances, undoubtedly, it may be material to the merits whether the right of entry accrued on the one day or the other. In such a case the judge would in all probability refuse to amend, and Mauls, J.—“The consent is to confess any lease that will establish the title of the lessor;” in Mariott v. Edwards, (1 M. & Rob. 320, S. C. 6 Car. & P. 208,) the court allowed the proper parish to be inserted, the parties not being misled by the misdescription; and see Gladwell v. Stagall, (8 Scott, 60); Roberts v. Snell, 1 M. & Gr. 577; Boys v. Ancell, (5 Bing. N. C. 390). There is one case which illustrates strongly the length to which the court will go where the merits are not affected. The action was by the indorsee against the indorser of a bill of exchange. The evidence was, that the defendant was payee of the bill, and, in that capacity, indorser to the plaintiff. The court allowed the amendment, as the defendant could raise no defence to the record as amended that was not open to him in its original form. This case is not opposed to Jelf v. Oriel, there the bill was stated to be specially accepted at “A. or B.” in the alternative, purporting to give the hæc verba, whereas in the former case, according to the usual form of pleading, the legal effect alone was given, which the court will, as we have shewn, be most liberal in amending, when the defendant is not thereby prejudiced.

To apply these principles to the case under consideration, we think the amendment went further than any of the cases we have referred to; first, because the averment placed on the record was not drawn from the instrument upon which the action was founded, whether it be considered with respect to the ipsissima verba, or the legal effect; and secondly, because the plaintiff, having stated his cause of action in as many shapes as appeared to him necessary to sustain it, should not be allowed to introduce an averment necessarily requiring a new plea. It may be said that as all these defences are in this country available under the general issue, that the defendant was not prejudiced as he would be at Westminster, if confined to one plea, but it appears to us that the plaintiff having the right to state his case without any limit as to the number of counts, and the defendant going to trial with a legal defence to each, which, in Duckworth v. Harrison, (5 M. & W. 427,) was held to be the defence at Nisi Prius, and not the defence to the action, that it was never intended by the legislature that the plaintiff should be allowed at the trial not only to cure a variance between his statement and his proof, but, in the language of Parke, B., (Doe v. Parsons.) “to cure a defect in his declaration.”

By these observations we do not mean to imply that the discretion of the judge in the principal case was not rightly exercised; if he had refused to amend, his decision could not be reviewed, and his strong sense of justice no doubt induced him to allow the amendment—whether his own opinions were favourable or otherwise—in order that the question might receive a more solemn adjudication by the full Court.

5. That the Bishop in whose diocese the church of such district shall be situate, shall have all ecclesiastical and spiritual jurisdiction, powers, and authorities in and over such district, and the incumbent or perpetual curate and inhabitants thereof, in the same manner, as if the entire of the said district had been formed out of parishes situate within such diocese; and the said district shall be deemed to be within the limits of such diocese: provided that nothing herein contained shall render the incumbent of any parish a portion whereof shall be included in such district, or the emoluments, rents, or tithe rent-charge of his benefice, subject to the jurisdiction of any bishop, save the bishop in whose diocese his benefice shall be situate, or prejudice his rights or liabilities otherwise than same would have been affected in case such district had been formed under the provisions of the said first-recited act.

6. “And whereas there are united parishes in Ireland, and it may be expedient on the death or removal of the incumbents thereof, to disunite same: And whereas, glebe houses have been or may be built on the glebe land of the parishes forming same; and the incumbents of same may be entitled to certain sums of money to be paid to such incumbents, or their executors or administrators, on the removal or death of such incumbents, by their successors: And whereas in the event of such united parishes being disunited, the glebe houses would be too large for the residence of the incumbent of any one of the two parishes theretofore forming such united parishes:” Be it enacted, after the passing of this act any such incumbent of any such united parishes may, with the consent of the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council, six at least of the said Privy Council assenting, exchange such glebe on which such glebe house may have been built, for lands of equal or greater value in any one of such disunited parishes, whereof he, the said incumbent may be entitled to, in such manner, with such consents, and under all the rules in the acts relating to the exchange of glebes in Ireland mentioned: provided, that in ascertaining the value of the glebe land so to be exchanged, such value shall be set upon such glebe house and other buildings as the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council shall deem just; and it shall not be lawful for such incumbent, his executors or administrators, to have, or claim from any successor, any sum of money to which he or they might be entitled in respect of any such glebe house, building, or improvements; and that any certificate granted to such incumbent shall, after such exchange, be null and void.

7. That all the provisions in the said acts herein-before recited applicable to districts formed there-under shall as amended by this act, be applicable to districts to be formed under and by virtue of this act, so far as the same are not inconsistent with this act.

8. That this act may be amended or repealed.

CAP. XLII.

An Act to facilitate the performance of the duties of Justices of the peace out of sessions within England and Wales with respect to persons charged with indictable offences. [14th August, 1848.]

Sec. 12 English warrants may be backed in Ireland, and vice versa, in the event of parties escaping. Warrants so indorsed to be valid.

14. English or Irish warrants may be backed in Scotland. Warrants so indorsed to be valid.

15. Scottish warrants may be backed in England or Ireland. Warrants so indorsed to be valid.

32. Act to extend to Berwick-upon-Tweed, but not to Scotland, Ireland, &c., except as to backing of warrants.

33. Commencement of act.

12. That if any person against whom a warrant shall be issued in any place in England or Wales, by any justice of the peace, or by any judge of the court of Queen's Bench, or justice of Oyer and Terminer or gaol delivery, for any indictable offence shall escape, go into, or be, suspected to be, in any part of Ireland, or if any person against whom such warrant shall be issued in any county or place in Ireland, shall escape, go into, or be, or suspected to be, in any place in England or Wales, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace in and for the place into which such person shall escape or go, or where he shall reside or be, to indorse (K.) such warrant shall be a sufficient authority to all persons, to execute same in the place where the justice so indorsing it shall have jurisdiction, by apprehending the person against whom such warrant shall have been granted, and to convey him before the justices who granted the same, or some other justices who shall thereupon proceed in such manner as if the said person had been apprehended in the said last-mentioned county or place.

14. That if any person against whom such warrant shall be issued in England or Ireland, shall escape, go into, or be, or be suspected to be, in Scotland, it shall be lawful for the sheriff or steward depute or substitute, or any justice of the peace of the county or place where such person shall go into, or be, to indorse (K.) the said warrant, which shall be a sufficient authority to all persons, to execute same in the county or place where it shall have been so indorsed, by apprehending the person against whom such warrant shall have been granted, and to convey him into England, Wales, or Ireland where the justice who first issued the said warrant shall have jurisdiction to be there dealt with according to law.

15. That if any person against whom such warrant shall be issued in Scotland, who shall escape, go into, or be, or shall be suspected to be, in England or Ireland, it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace in the place into which such person shall escape, or where he shall be, or shall be suspected to be, to indorse (K.) the said warrant which shall be sufficient authority to the persons bringing same, and to all persons to execute the said warrant in the county or place where it is so indorsed, by apprehending the person against whom such warrant shall have been granted, and to convey him into the place in Scotland next adjoining to England, to be dealt with according to the practice of the law of Scotland, as if the said offender had been apprehended in Scotland.

32. But nothing in this act shall extend to Scotland or Ireland, or to the isles of Man, Jersey, or Guernsey, save and except the provisions respecting the backing of warrants.

33. That this act shall commence and take effect on the 3d October, 1848.

CAP. XLIII.

*Whereas, by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, for facilitating the winding-up of the affairs of joint stock companies unable to meet their pecuniary engagements: and the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 98, for facilitating the winding-up the affairs of joint stock companies in Ireland unable to meet their pecuniary engagements: and by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, to facilitate the dissolution of certain railway companies, it was enacted that it should be lawful for a meeting of the shareholders of any company in said act mentioned, to determine same should be dissolved; and that, in addition to the question of dissolution, it should be imperative on the meeting to decide whether such dissolution should or not be an act of bankruptcy, for the purpose of having the affairs of the company wound up, but that such provision should not extend to railways in Scotland; and that any three of the committee of any company so dissolved, at any time after the dissolution thereof should have been resolved, or any creditor of such company to the amount requisite to support a fiat in bankruptcy in England and Ireland, or a sequestration in Scotland, might within three months after the dissolution thereof, petition that a fiat in bankruptcy might issue against such company if in England or Ireland, or that the estates of the company sequestered if in Scotland; and, that upon the production of a copy of the London Gazette containing the resolution of any such meeting, that the dissolution should be an act of bankruptcy, or upon the petition of any three of the committee, or of any creditor, a fiat in bankruptcy should issue against such company by their registered name, and the company should thereupon be deemed within the provisions of the said acts for facilitating the winding-up of joint stock companies, &c., and for facilitating the winding-up of joint stock companies in Ireland, &c., as if a fiat had issued before its dissolution, but such last provision was not to extend to Scotland: and whereas, it is expedient that the said two first-mentioned acts should be amended, and that further facilities should be given for the dissolution and winding-up of joint stock companies and other partnerships: be it enacted, that this act shall apply to all companies, corporate or unincorporate, within the provisions of either of the two acts first-mentioned, (including all companies existing on the 1st November, 1844, and which shall have, or shall obtain a certificate of registration under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110,) and to all companies which would have been within the provisions of either of the said two acts if they had not been dissolved, or had not ceased to trade at the passing thereof, and to all banking companies which would have been within the provisions thereof if they had not been excepted from the provisions of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and to all companies which under the provisions of the said act to facilitate the dissolution of certain railway companies shall, before the 1st of March 1848, have become bankrupt, and to all companies, associations, and partnerships to be formed after the passing of this act whereof the capital or the profits is to be divided into shares, transferable without the express consent of all the copartners.

2. That all companies for the purposes of working mines or minerals, and all benefit building societies other than such as are certified and enrolled under the statutes respecting such societies, shall be liable to the operation of this act: provided that nothing herein contained shall affect the jurisdiction of the court of Stannaries in Cornwall.

3. That the following words and expressions in this act shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them, so far as not excluded by the context.

The words "Lord Chancellor" shall include the Lord Keeper and the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal: The word "Company" shall mean any partnership, association, or company, corporate or unincorporate, to which this act applies:

Portobello, March 2d.

Sir,

"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has several advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture, it is susceptible of a very high polish, it does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

"THOMAS ANTISEL, Lecturer on Chemistry."

"Mr. Kelly, College-green."

TROUSERS.—The numerous testimonials received by JAMES O'DRISCOLL, in approval of the elegance, ease, and peculiar style of his Trousers, and the value of the very flattering patronage bestowed on him by the higher classes of society, induces him to apprise his patrons, and those gentlemen who have not hitherto honored him with their orders, that he has secured the services of a few of the most experienced Paris workmen for the winter season. J. O'D's practical knowledge as a Trousers Cutter having been fully tested in the first houses of the British metropolis, he is therefore fully qualified to produce an article in this department of Tailoring, that cannot be excelled in London or Paris. JAMES O'DRISCOLL, Professor Trousers Maker, 9, ANGLESEA STREET.

By the transposition of a line, the printer rendered unintelligible the illustration we gave in our last number of the inequality of the pressure of the Poor Law; we therefore re-state the instance. A father, from a property producing £600 per annum, grants a rent-charge of £400 to his eldest son for life, remainder to trustees and their heirs, to the use of that son's issue, and subsequently conveys the estate, subject to a life interest for himself, to his second son. Then comes the Poor Law, throwing the whole rate on the £200 per annum, during the life of the eldest son, thus exempting the rent-charge, which comes within the saving of the 79th section of the 1 & 2 Vic. c. 56. We have known of rates struck within the year of 10s. in the pound, and, in such case, the father would be left nothing, whilst the son, whose interest is better in amount and probable duration—his life being the younger of the two—pockets the whole of the rent-charge, without the deduction of a single farthing.

Is not this an unjust anomaly, which never could have been contemplated by the legislature?

In our last number—dismissing the hope of further relief from the Consolidated Fund—we reduced the discussion, as to the source from whence means for the relief of the pauperism of Ireland was to be derived, to a question between a local tax confined to the limits of individual estates, with a rate in aid extending to the entire surface of Ireland, and a general tax, irrespective of any proportion between its amount and the quantity of pauperism in particular estates or localities.

It is contended that the adoption of the former would stimulate the proprietors of particular estates to exertion. Give us our own poor, they say, and protect us from the pauperism of our neighbours.

We will employ the able-bodied on the cultivation of our estates, and by this means we will be enabled to support the infirm, contribute to the general expenses of the union, and pay a rate in aid beside, if our own taxation does not exceed a certain amount.

To carry out this plan, would require, in the first place, a vast multiplication of electoral divisions by the erection of each individual estate into one, as its sole hope of success rests on the stimulus which the separate taxation of each estate would impart to its owner.

A second requisite would be, a settlement for the pauper—in fact, a chaining of paupers to individual estates.

There would be great difficulty in properly carrying out the first requisite. We know poor electoral divisions, and many of them, which contain thirty or forty different properties—of course there are many containing less—but we are sure we are below the mark when we say, that by this arrangement, the number of electoral divisions would be increased tenfold. The accounts of each of these divisions must be kept distinct, and though some of the proprietors might undertake to support or employ their own poor—as the death of each pauper would be a positive gain to the proprietor—a very strict superintendence would be necessary to prevent such an event occurring either, by design, or accident, and to take care that the poor were fairly treated. Thus the machinery of the poor law—far from being rendered less expensive—would be rendered more complicated and costly.

Having carried out this minute subdivision, how many would be in a position to take advantage of it? We fear very few in proportion to the whole number of proprietors; for even if inclination and energy existed in all, the vast majority would want power—first, that very numerous class, whose incomes are scarce sufficient to pay the interest and annuities with which their estates are chargeable; and, secondly, that class, also very numerous, whose estates are under the control of Courts of Equity. We have no accurate means of ascertaining to what precise proportion of the country estates so circumstanced extend; but from the rough estimate we have been enabled to form, we conclude, that in the distressed parts of Ireland three-fourths of the estates are helpless from one or other of these causes.

The next requisite would be a law of settlement. This would give the pauper, on a well-circumstanced estate, the advantage of employment and wages, but it would cut off the pauper on the embarrassed estate from the chance of either—as when the paupers were once settled (which, in initio, would cause much trouble and litigation), each proprietor would take care to prevent any more families settling on his estate—besides many proprietors have their estates in large grazing farms, quite free from population; and others, of late years—by justifiable or unjustifiable means—have got rid of their population: so much so, that a system of taxation based on the numerical amount of the population on each estate, would be very unequal, and often very unjust.

But, by limiting the local tax, it is said, all this would be remedied; by this contrivance, the densely-peopled estate will not be taxed more than it can bear, and the grazier and exterminator in the neighbourhood will be compelled to aid in the support of the poor.

But what should be the limit to the local tax? What the amount, which—whilst it would compel proprietors to give employment—would not, at the same time, by weighing too heavily on them, deter them from exertion.

Now, it must be remembered that the parts of the country where the limit would be most needed—where, in fact, it could not be dispensed with—were those in which the value of land is very much depreciated; so that any rate based on the present valuation will be far higher than that represented by the proportion expressing it. In fact, property has been reduced, at least, twenty-five per cent.; so that 3s. in the £1, on the valuation, would be 4s. in the £1 in the value; and in the districts which are almost out of cultivation, of course much more—in some of these, 3s. in the £1 is more than they could pay.

Assuming, then, 3s. in the £1 as the limit of the local taxation, and assuming that the sum required for the support of the poor in 1849 will be the same as that required in 1848, according to the first Annual Report of the Poor Law Commissioners for that year, we propose to submit the system of local taxation, with a rate in aid, to the test of figures, and ascertain what that rate in aid would probably amount to.

The total number of unions in Ireland are 291, of these there are 58 unions which, according to the Report of the Commissioners referred to, required a rate of more than 3s. in the £1, and in which, if the rate were limited to 3s., the proceeds would fall short of the sum required by £610,255. This sum should be raised by a rate in aid on the remaining 63 unions, and which—their valuation amounting to £8,624,762—would require a rate of 1s. 5d. in the £1.

Again, by the addition of 1s. 5d. to the local taxation, the rate on 36 out of these 63 unions would be raised above the prescribed limit; on which, in consequence, the proceeds would fall short of the sum required by £96,515, which sum must be raised by an additional rate in aid of the remaining 27 unions; and, their valuation being £4,523,774, would require an additional rate of 5½d. in the £1.

Hence, on this supposition, 94 unions would be taxed to the limit, and the remaining 27 to 1s. 10½d. in the £1.

Again, a necessary part of the local taxation is, the cost of the Poor Law establishment. The cost for 1848 amounted to about £540,000, being about £45,000 a month, and this cost would require a rate of 10d. in the £1, and hence, independent of the support of the poor of the union, the rate in these twenty-seven unions would necessarily be 2s. 8½d. in the £1.; so that on the score of economy to the well circumstanced unions, this system would not be worth the additional trouble.

It may be said that 3s. in the £1. is too low a limit. Let us consider to what, one of 4s. in the £1. would reduce the rate in aid.

There are forty-one unions in Ireland which require for the support of the poor-law more than a rate of 4s. in the £1., and the limitation of the rate to this amount would cause a deficiency in the proceeds amounting to £373,825; this sum should be raised by a rate in aid on the remaining ninety unions, whose valuation amounts to £10,386,015, so that the rate in aid would be 9d. in the £1.

Again, the addition of 9d. to the local taxation would raise the rate on sixteen of these ninety unions to above 4s. in the £1., and create an additional deficiency of £25,170, which should be raised by an additional rate in aid, off the remaining seventy-four unions, and their valuation being £8,691,070, would require a rate in aid, of about ¾d.

Hence the rate required to aid a local tax limited to 4s. in the £1., would amount to 9¾d., and, added to the establishment expenses, would produce 19¾d. which each of the seventy-four unions should bear, beside the cost of its own poor; in fact it would be more, as the expenses of management would be greatly increased by the multiplication of minute electoral divisions; so that, even on this supposition, the rate in aid would be by no means a trivial tax.

We do not suppose it necessary to urge the calculation further, and try the effect of a limiting tax of 5s. in the £1. on the rate in aid. In fact it is idle to suppose that 4s. in the £1. could be raised on the present valuation off the distressed districts, and, if it were insisted on, would have the effect of discouraging all exertion in them.

Putting out of view altogether for the present, the enormous expense and litigation annexed to the multiplication of minute electoral divisions, and a law of settlement for the pauper. What is the advantage of this system over that which would provide for the support of pauperism by a general tax?

How does the rate in aid differ in principle from the general tax? If not in this, that the rate in aid is raised for the benefit of unions which do not contribute to it, and paid by unions, who, by no exertion, can in the least diminish its amount; whereas the general tax, varying with the number of persons relieved would be slightly affected by individual exertion.

The tendency of the local tax to stimulate the owners of minute electoral divisions to exertion, is the sole argument in its favour. Where proprietors are rich, and the flood of pauperism not overwhelming, it may lead to beneficial results—results which at least ought to follow from a better principle, and without the necessity for all this cumbersome and expensive machinery. Where capital is abundant, and labour cheap, it would not seem to require the stimulus of a heavy tax to compel the capitalist to employ the labourer.

Where proprietors are helpless, and pauperism overwhelming, the system admittedly will not work. In these cases it says, we will confine your poor to your estate—we will make you pay all you can afford to keep them from dying, 4s. in the pound, if possible, if not, 3s.—and we will compel your more fortunate neighbours to supply what may still be wanting. However, though we won't allow you to employ the paupers, we will by no means suffer them to be idle. We will employ them ourselves at breaking stones, for which we will charge the country ten pence in the pound. But, alas, this will not render the estate better able to pay 4s. in the pound, or tend in the least to diminish the amount of the rate in aid required from the rest of the county. Hence the benefit of this system thus extends only to those parts of Ireland where the proprietors are rich, or comparatively so, and where pauperism is confined to moderate limits—that is not one-third of Ireland.

On the other hand, what are the advantages of a general tax over the system we have explained?

1st. A diminution in the expense of the machinery of the Poor Law, by getting rid of minute electoral divisions.

2d. The necessity of a law of settlement for the paupers would be obviated.

3d. All property in Ireland would be placed on the same level, and thus the distressed parts rendered as attractive to the capitalist as the richest and most prosperous.

As the stimulus given to the proprietor by the hope of diminishing the local tax is the cheval de bataille, of the former system, so the rendering the distressed districts of Ireland attractive to the capitalist is the strong point of this. The former claims credit for protecting from heavy taxation the rich unions of Ireland, whilst on the contrary, the hopes of the latter rest entirely on rendering the poorer ones self-supporting.

Which tends most directly to the general prosperity of the country—a prosperity by which the rich unions are sensibly affected, as appears from the preceding calculations—admits of easy solution.

MASTER HENRY'S OFFICE.

IN RE MAHER, A LUNATIC.

Serjeant O'Brien appeared, and was about to apply to the Master, who said he could not hear one of her Majesty's Sergeants-at-Law. Serjeant O'Brien said he was not aware such was the practice, and that the Solicitor-general was to oppose him. Mr. Henn.—I cannot hear you or the Solicitor-general. In England, even Queen's counsel are not heard in the Master's offices.

Court Papers.

ORDERS IN CHANCERY SINCE 1843.

Dated the 18th April, 1844.

1. Whereas by an order, bearing date the 13th of July, 1843, it was referred to the Masters in ordinary of the Court of Chancery to reconsider the Schedule of fees allowed to the solicitors of the said Court, and it was directed that the Masters, in re-considering the same, should have regard to the schedule of fees proposed for adoption by the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, with a view to assimilate, so far as practicable, the rate of charge in each court: and the said Masters having made their report, bearing date the 3rd day of October, 1843, pursuant to the said order, and having therein submitted certain matters for consideration, his Lordship with such advice and assistance as aforesaid, did, by order, bearing date the 29th January, 1844, direct that the fee of three-pence per folio for copies of documents should continue to be allowed to the solicitors of the Court; and that no alteration should be made in certain items in the said report, and in the said order specified: and did further direct that said report should be confirmed in all other particulars, and did thereby refer it to the said Masters to amend the schedule of fees, pursuant to the said report and order: and the said Masters having, by their report, bearing date the 13th of April instant, certified that they had accordingly amended the said schedule of fees, and that they had annexed the same to their said report, and to which, as a part of said report, they thereby referred: it is ordered by his Lordship, with the advice and assistance of the Right Honorable the Master of the Rolls, that the said report be confirmed, and that the said schedule of fees thereunto annexed be, and the same is hereby approved of: and it is further ordered, that that the operation of the same shall commence and take effect from the 1st day of May next; and that the schedule of fees referred to in the 156th general order of the Court, and set forth in the Appendix to the said general orders be, and the same is hereby rescinded, from and after the said 1st day of May, but to have full operation in all matters up to that day inclusive.

2. That whenever one of the Masters in ordinary of this Court shall, in pursuance of the 171st general order, deem it right to appoint a person guardian of the fortune of a minor without a receiver, and to give such person an allowance or poundage for his pains, such Master shall in no case allow such person any greater sum than two and a half per cent. on the sum to be received by him, and then subject to the direction of the Court.

3. That the Master may, in every case where a receiver is acting over the estate of a minor or lunatic, from time to time, after he has exercised the power given to him by the 173rd general order, make the like inquiry as to whether any, and what abatements or allowances should be made or continued to the tenants, or any of them; and the better to enable the Master to make such inquiry, guardians, committees, and receivers shall receive and enter in a book, to be kept by them for that purpose, all such claims for abatements or allowances as the tenants shall think themselves entitled to make; and every such guardian, committee, or receiver shall, at the time of passing his annual accounts, or of proceeding before the Master upon any statement of facts in relation to other matters connected with the estate, submit such claims, with his opinion thereon, to the Master, and the Master shall then examine into the justice of such claims, and shall by a certificate to be signed by him, authorise the receiver, or guardian, or committee, to make such abatements or allowances to the tenants whom he shall therein specify, as he shall think fit; and such receiver, or guardian, or committee, shall thenceforth receive and enforce from the said tenants the abated rent only, until such certificate shall be varied or set aside, either by a further certificate of the Master, or by an order of the court, upon the application of the committee or guardian; but no tenant shall originate such inquiry otherwise than by so submitting his claim to such receiver, or guardian, or committee, or be allowed to interfere therein, further, or otherwise, than as the Master shall think proper.

And it is further ordered, that said two last-mentioned orders shall take effect from the date hereof.

EDWARD B. SUGDEN, C.
F. BLACKBURN, M. R.

Dated 3rd day of January, 1845.

1. That it shall not be necessary to enter an appearance for a defendant in the books kept in the registrar's office of this Court, but the entry of such appearance in the books kept in the office of the clerk of appearances and writs shall be deemed sufficient for all purposes, and the clerk of appearances and writs shall, from and after the day that these orders are to come into operation, be at liberty to issue a certificate of an appearance that has been or may be entered in his books, in the same manner as the registrars of the Court have heretofore done; and the fee of 2s. 4d. now payable to the registrar on such certificate shall from and after said day be received by the clerk of appearances and writs, and paid by him weekly over to the registrars, who are to account therefor in the same manner as for the other fees receivable in their office.

2. It having been found impracticable to carry the whole of the 190th general order into execution, the same shall be considered from this date as rescinded, except so far as the same is herein repeated.

That the solicitor for the party, on the day he shall file an original bill, or obtain the first order on a petition matter, shall lodge a docket in the office of the clerk of the appearances and writs, stating the title of such cause or matter, and the clerk of appearances and writs shall, on the day following that on which such docket shall be lodged in his office, mark on such docket (and which shall afterwards be transcribed into a book to be kept for that purpose) the name of the Master to whom such cause or matter is to stand referred, and to whom all references therein are to be directed, and for that purpose he shall introduce the name of each Master in rotation, in each cause and matter respectively commencing with the senior Master: and it is further ordered, that the clerk of appearances and writs shall at the time of inserting the name of every such Master stamp the said docket with the seal of his office, in order that the Master to whom the cause or matter is referred may have evidence that his name has been properly inserted therein: and that so much of the 189th general order as requires the clerk of the appearances and writs to have the several books of notices in his office indexed shall also be rescinded, but the clerk of appearances and writs shall have such notices bound up in one or more volumes, at the end of each term, according to the dates that such notices were respectively served.

3. That no guardian, receiver, or sequestrator shall either himself, or by any bailiff or other person, receive, in such character, any sum of money whatever, either for rent or otherwise, from any tenant or other person bound or legally authorized to pay the same, without giving to such person a good and sufficient receipt or acknowledgment in writing for the same; and if it shall at any time appear to the Master before whom such guardian, receiver, or sequestrator shall account, that any monies have been received by or for or on account of such guardian, receiver, or sequestrator without any such receipt as aforesaid having been given for the same, the Master shall, upon passing the account of such guardian, receiver, or sequestrator, when or next after such fact shall have come to his knowledge, disallow to such person so accounting, all or such part of his poundage or costs of accounting, or both, as he shall deem right or proper.

4. That every guardian, receiver, and sequestrator shall, upon the passing of his account before the Master lay before him an exact copy of the account lodged by him in the Master's office; and if upon the passing of such account, the account produced before him shall vary in any particular, which the Master shall deem essential, from the copy so lodged, the Master shall be at liberty, not only to disallow to the said guardian, receiver, or sequestrator, the costs of the summons which he shall have issued for the purpose of passing the said account, but also to order that he shall pay to such parties as shall attend upon the said summons the costs of their several attendances, and to order that he shall at his own expense amend the account so lodged in the Master's office, by making the same conformable to the copy so laid before him; or if necessary, file a new account, and issue a summons to pass the same for such day as the Master shall then appoint; and the Master shall, in every such case, upon passing the said account, be at liberty to make such rule, in relation to the said receiver's poundage, and costs of accounting, as the justice of the case shall seem to him to require, without putting the estate to the expense of a certificate to enlarge the time for accounting, in case the period limited by the 115th rule for passing his account shall have expired before the time appointed by the Master for passing such new or amended account; and all such costs as the Master shall so award shall be recoverable in like manner as ordered by the 133rd general rule, and every receiver and sequestrator shall, if required by the person or persons to whom the property belongs, subject to the charges for the security of which the receiver or sequestrator was appointed, or by his or their solicitor, furnish to him or them a copy of any account lodged by him in the Master's office, on being paid the usual scrivency charges therefor.

5. That the fees in the schedule hereunto annexed shall be established fees and emoluments to be allowed on taxation to solicitors, and that the schedule of fees referred to in the first general order, bearing date the 18th day of April, 1844, be and the same is hereby rescinded.

That the above general orders shall come into operation and have effect from and after the 11th day of January, 1845, but the schedule of fees mentioned in the first general order of the 18th day of April, 1844, shall have full operation in all matters up to that day inclusive.

EDWARD B. SUGDEN, C.
F. BLACKBURN, M. R.

And the foregoing orders, Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, to apply in like manner to Committees of Lunatics.

EDWARD B. SUGDEN, C.

Dated 26th day of October, 1845.

1. That the office of the Taxing Master of the Court of Chancery shall, until further order, be held at No. 2, Capel-street, in the city of Dublin.

2. That the office of the Taxing Master shall be open for business upon all days of the year, except as hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, Sundays, Christmas day, and the three next after Christmas day, New Year's day, Good Friday, and Easter Monday and Tuesday, and for each period, or periods during the long vacation as the Lord Chancellor, for the time being, shall from time to time appoint; and the hours of attendance therein shall be from half-past ten until four o'clock each day during term and the sittings after term, or until five o'clock on any days which the Taxing Master shall deem it expedient or necessary to extend the time; and from twelve until two o'clock each day the office is open during the long vacation, and from twelve until three o'clock in all other vacations; but the closing of the office shall not preclude the Taxing Master from requiring the continued attendance of the clerks for such further time as he may deem necessary; and the Taxing Master shall be at liberty to grant such holiday or holidays during the long vacation to the clerks as he shall deem right, having regard to the state of the business of the office; but in every case of his so doing he shall communicate to the Lord Chancellor, in writing, the extent of the permission so given.

3. That the Taxing Master shall perform all such duties as have heretofore been referred to, or performed by the Masters in Ordinary in relation to the taxation of costs, and shall in respect thereof have all such powers and authorities of every description as are now vested in the Masters in Ordinary; and shall direct and adopt all such proceedings as may now be directed and adopted by the Masters in Ordinary.

on a reference for the taxation of costs, and taking an account of what is due in respect of such costs, and such other accounts connected therewith as may be directed by the Court, and shall administer such oaths, and take such affirmations and attestations of honour, as the said Masters in Ordinary have heretofore being in the habit of doing, on such references, or as may become necessary for the purpose of carrying said act, or these orders into execution.

4. That all general orders of the Court, which relate to the taxation of costs, or any proceedings before the Masters in Ordinary in relation thereto, shall, so far as they may be applicable, be applied to the taxation of costs, and all proceedings before the Taxing Master in connexion therewith.

5. That the respective Masters in Ordinary shall, on or before the first day of November next, cause all bills of costs which have been or shall be lodged in their offices before the said first day of November next, pursuant to the 160th general order of the Court, to be transferred to the office of the Taxing Master; and that on and after that day, all bill of costs shall be lodged in the office of the Taxing Master, in the same manner and subject to the same regulations as are specified in the 160th and 161st general orders of the Court, now in force in relation to bills of costs now directed to be lodged in the office of the Masters in Ordinary.

6. That all bills of costs which, by any decree or order, have been referred for taxation to any Masters in Ordinary, who shall not have certified the costs due thereon before the first day of November next, are hereby transferred to the Taxing Master, and that if any bills of costs have been proceeded with before the said first day of November, the Taxing Master shall be at liberty to adopt the whole, or such part as he shall think fit, of the proceedings which have taken place before the transfer thereof to him.

7. That in cases where the accounts of any trustee, executor, administrator, consignee, or committee, shall consist in part of any bills of costs, and in cases of any proceedings under any general order, whereby the Master in Ordinary is at liberty to award and tax the costs of any proceedings before him, the Master in Ordinary, to whom it may be referred to take such account, or before whom any such proceedings may take place, shall be at liberty to request the Taxing Master to tax and settle such bills of costs; and the Taxing Master, on receiving such request, shall proceed to tax such bills, and shall have the same powers as if the same had been referred to him by the Court, and shall certify the amount due thereon to the Master in Ordinary at whose request the same were taxed.

8. That if upon the taxation of any bill of costs it shall appear to the Taxing Master, that for the purpose of duly taxing the same, it is necessary to inspect any books, papers, or proceedings relating to the cause or matter which shall be in the office of any Master in Ordinary, the Taxing Master shall be at liberty to request the Master in Ordinary having any such book, paper, or proceedings in his office, to cause the same to be transmitted to the office of the Taxing Master, and also to request any Master in Ordinary to certify any proceedings in his office which may be comprised in a bill of costs under taxation; and in that case the Master in Ordinary, when and so soon as at and for such times as the due transaction of the business in his own office will permit, shall direct such books, papers, and documents to be transmitted to the office of the Taxing Master, for his use during the taxation, and shall certify the proceedings which have taken place in his office, according to the request of the Taxing Master, and after the costs, in respect of which such request of the Taxing Master was made, shall have been certified, the Taxing Master shall cause the same books, papers, and documents, which have been transmitted to his office, to be returned to the office of the Master in Ordinary by whom they were transmitted.

9. That when any paper or document shall be transmitted from the office of a Master in Ordinary to the office of the Taxing Master, the Taxing Master, or his clerk, shall sign a receipt therefor in the book of the Master in Ordinary; and that when any such paper or document shall be returned from the office of the Taxing Master to the office of the Master in Ordinary, an entry of such return shall be made in the same book, and signed by the Master in Ordinary, or his clerk.

10. That all orders that shall be made by the Taxing Master shall be drawn up in a short form, and shall be signed by the Taxing Master, and entered by his clerk in a book to be called the "Taxing Master's Order Book," to be kept exclusively for that purpose; and each order, before the same is issued, shall be marked by the Taxing Master's clerk in this form, "Entered A. B.;" and each party shall be at liberty to inspect, during office hours, the entry of all such orders without fee or charge.

11. That all orders of the Taxing Master requiring any person to do any act hereby ordered, shall state the time, or the time after service of the order, within which such act is to be done; and upon the copy of the order which shall be served upon the party required to obey the same, there shall be endorsed a memorandum in the words, or to the effect of that directed by the 104th general order of the Court, with respect to all such orders issued by the Court.

12. That an office copy of every decree or order, whereby any costs are directed to be paid, shall be lodged in the office of the Taxing Master before he shall proceed with the taxation of such costs; and the solicitor lodging such copy shall be answerable that it is a correct copy and also every application for the taxation of costs, pursuant to the 165th general order, and the undertaking therein mentioned, shall be lodged in his office.

EDWARD B. SUGDEN, C.
F. BLACKBURN, M. R.

Dated 13th March, 1846.

Whereas by an Act of Parliament made and passed in the Session of Parliament held in the 8th & 9th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, intituled "An act to alter and amend an act passed in the third and fourth year of the reign of Her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled "An act to enable the owners of settled estates to defray the expenses of draining the same by way of mortgage," it was amongst other things enacted, that, for simplifying the proceedings under the said act, and rendering the same inexpensive, it should be lawful for the Lord High Chancellor, with the assistance of the Master of the Rolls, from time to time to make such orders and provision as he might think proper for the facilitating the mode of application to the court, and of the proceedings before the Master or otherwise; and whereas the right honorable Sir Edward Burtenshaw Sugden, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, has with the assistance of the right honorable Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, Master of the Rolls, and for the purpose in the said act mentioned, thought proper to make the following orders and provisions. Now, therefore, it is ordered by the Lord High Chancellor, with the assistance of the Master of the Rolls, that all applications made to this court pursuant to the said act, and all proceedings to be had thereunder, shall be made and conducted in the manner directed by the several orders and provisions herein-after set forth; viz.—

I. Any person entitled to land within the meaning of the said act, may present to the Lord Chancellor a petition in the form herein-after set forth, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of the case may require.

(Form of petition.) In the matter of and
In the matter of the act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 58), &c.

To the right honorable the Lord Chancellor.

The humble petition of A. B.

Sheweth—That the lands herein-after mentioned, viz. [s.c. s.c. s.c.] are now vested in your petitioner as tenant for life [or otherwise in some other character described in the act], and that your petitioner claims to be entitled to make permanent improvements in the said lands, by such means as are in the said act mentioned, and to cause the expense of making the same to be made a charge on the inheritance of the said lands under the provisions of the said act.

That the said lands are in the actual occupation of C. D. who hath consented in writing to this application.

Your petitioner therefore prays, that your petitioner may be at liberty to make permanent improvements in the said lands, by the means in the said act mentioned, or some of such means, and to cause the expense of making such improvements to be made a charge on the inheritance of the said lands under the provisions of the said act, or that your Lordship will make such other order in the premises as to your Lordship shall seem meet.

And your petitioner, &c. (Signed) A. B.
I hereby consent to this petition.
(Signed) C. D., occupying tenant of the lands sought to be improved.

II. The Lord Chancellor, or Master of the Rolls, by whom such petition may be heard, may, upon consideration of such petition, and without any attendance of counsel, solicitor, or petitioner thereon, if he shall so think fit, make an order on such petition to the effect following, or to such other like effect, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of case may require.

(Form of Order).—Date In the matter of, &c.
and in the matter of the act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 56), &c.

Upon consideration, &c., of the petition, &c., it is ordered that it be referred to the Master in rotation to enquire and state to the court whether the petitioner is entitled in possession to the lands in the petition mentioned, or any, and which of them, within the meaning of the said act of parliament, and whether the said lands are in the actual occupation of C. D. in the said petition named; and if so, under what title, and whether the said C. D. has consented in writing to the said petition and to the improvements proposed to be made under the provisions of the said act? And if the Master shall find that the petitioner is so entitled, and that the said C. D. is in such occupation, and has so consented, let the Master further enquire and state to the court succinctly, what, if any, other persons or person are or is entitled to, or interested in, the said lands, or any of them, in remainder or reversion; and the petitioner is to be at liberty to lay before the Master proposals for making permanent improvements in the said lands, by any such means as are in the said act mentioned, and to set forth in such proposals the nature and extent of such improvements, and the estimated expense thereof, and the estimated value of the permanent improvements proposed to be made; and such proposals are to be sufficient without any charge or state of facts; and the Master is to enquire and state whether such proposed improvements are permanent improvement within the meaning of the said act; and if so, what will be the expense of making the same, and what will be the value of such permanent improvements? and whether it will be beneficial to all persons interested in the said lands, that such permanent improvements should be made under the provisions of the said act?

III. The Master to whom the said reference may be made is to require proof of the deed, will, or other instrument under which the petitioner claims to be entitled to the land, but he is not otherwise to require proof of the title to the land, nor is any charge to be allowed for searching the registries.

IV. The Master, if he shall think it necessary for the due prosecution of reference, but not otherwise, may direct the petitioner to serve any other person interested in the land, with notice of the proceedings; and such person, so served, may afterwards attend such proceedings as a party thereto, as long as the Master shall deem his presence necessary; but if such person being so served, shall decline or neglect to attend pursuant to such notice, the Master may proceed in his absence, and he is to state the same in his report? any person so attending will have to bear his own costs.

V. The Master is, during the reference, to be at liberty to apply by note, in writing, to the judge by whom the order was made, for any special directions, or for leave to state any special circumstances, touching the matters referred to him; and, if he shall receive any such special directions, or such leave, he is to state the same, and his proceeding thereon, in his report; but such note and directions are not to be treated as regular reports or orders of the court requiring to be filed or otherwise.

VI. Any person interested in the land is, without its being necessary for him to take any objection or give any previous notice, within fourteen days after the filing of the report, to be at liberty to petition the Lord Chancellor that such report may be reviewed: if such petition shall be presented, the Judge by whom the reference was made is to take the same into his consideration: and, if he shall so think fit, he may dispose thereof, either by dismissing the same, or by referring the matter back to the Master with or without special directions: he may also direct any person interested to attend, and may, if he shall think it necessary, but not otherwise, direct the same to be argued by counsel in open court or otherwise.

VII. That the petition to confirm a report may be in the form herein-after set forth, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of the case may require.

(Form of Petition).—In the matter of, &c. and in the matter of the act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 56), &c.

To the right honorable the Lord Chancellor.

The humble petition of &c.

Sheweth—That in pursuance of an order made in this matter, bearing date the day of Mr. the Master to whom the said matter was referred, has made his report bearing date, the day of and for the reasons therein stated has [here state the Master's finding.]

That the said report has been filed in the Report office of this court, and that no special application has been made to review the same.

Your petitioner, therefore, humbly prays your Lordship, that the said report may be confirmed absolutely, and that your petitioner may be authorized to make such permanent improvements as are certified in the said report, under the provisions of the said act.

VIII. The order confirming the report may be in the form following, with such, if any variations, as the nature and circumstances of the case may require.

(Form of order).—Date In the matter of
and in the matter of the act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 56), &c.

Whereas did on the day of prefer his petition to the right honorable the Lord Chancellor, thereby setting forth, and praying, that he might be at liberty to make permanent improvements in the lands therein mentioned, under the provisions of the said act; and thereupon his Lordship, on consideration of the matter of the said petition, did, by his order, dated the day of refer it to the Master to make the inquiries therein mentioned; and, in pursuance of the said order, the said Master has made his report, dated the day of, [the particulars not to be stated,] and the said report was duly filed in the Report office, on the day of and no application has been made that the same may not be confirmed, and that the said A. B. doth now by his petition pray that the same may be confirmed, and that he may be at liberty to make such permanent improvements as are specified in the said report, under the provisions of the said act: his Lordship, on consideration of the matter of the said petition, and the said Master's report, doth hereby order that the said report be confirmed, and that the said petitioner be at liberty to make such permanent improvements in the said lands as are in the said report mentioned, under the provisions of the said act.

IX. The Master by whom the said report was made may, upon production to him of the order confirming the same and giving leave to make the improvements, deliver to the party who has obtained such order a certificate to the effect and in the form herein-after stated, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each case may require.

(Form of Certificate.)—Date In the matter of
and in the matter of the act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 56.) &c.
Whereas [Recite, 1st, the Order of reference, shortly;
2d, the Report, with its date, but without any particulars;

3d, the Order "confirming the Report, and authorizing the improvements to be made," with its date, and generally in the terms within inverted commas.]

Now, therefore, I the said Master, in pursuance of the said act, do hereby certify that any person advancing money for making the said permanent improvements specified in my said report, will, upon its being made to appear to me that such money, to the amount specified in my said report, has been fully expended in making the said improvements, or in paying the expense of obtaining the authority of this court, become and be entitled under the said act to a charge on the land for the repayment of the money advanced, with interest; but such charge is to be subject to the terms and conditions provided by the said act, and before the same can become effective, the amount of money expended as aforesaid is to be stated by me by way of endorsement on this certificate.

X. The endorsement required by the act to be made by the Master on the said certificate, may be to the effect and in the form herein-after set forth, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each case may require.

(Form of Endorsement.)—Whereas it has been alleged before me that the sum of £ being the whole [or part] of the sum of £ mentioned in my report recited in the within certificate, has been expended in making such improvements and paying such expenses as are therein mentioned; I have, pursuant to the liberty given to me by the said act, enquired what expenses have been incurred in and about the application to the court, and making the necessary surveys, valuations, and estimates, and also what sums of money have been actually expended in such improvements; and evidences as to such expense hath been laid before me, and I have duly considered the same, and I do hereby state and certify that it hath been made to appear to me that the sum of £ hath been fully expended in manner aforesaid in such expenses as aforesaid, and the sum of £ for improvements by drainage, warping, irrigation, or embankment, and the sum of £ for improvements by the erection of buildings: and I do hereby further certify that the said several sums amount in the whole to sum of £ and that the same was [or were] advanced on, &c. [or at such several times and in the several sums herein-after set forth; viz. &c.] and that such several sums are to be repaid, with interest after the rate of per centum per annum, by such equal annual instalments as herein-after mentioned, viz. &c. &c. [This is to be varied according to the mode of expenditure and the provisions of the 9th section of the act.]

EDWARD B. SUGDEN, C.
T. B. C. SMITH, M. R.

N.B.—Section 14 of the act points out the nature of the evidence to be received by the Master; section 5 requires the report to be filed in the Report Office, and gives power to apply to review a report within fourteen days; and section 6 gives liberty to the Master to inquire into the expenditure, and to indorse upon the certificate the amount thereof; and section 7 requires such certificate to be filed in the Report Office, and a duplicate thereof to be provided as evidence of title.

Dated 27th January, 1847.

It is this day ordered, by the right hon. the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, by and with the advice and assistance of the right hon. the Master of the Rolls, that the Masters in ordinary of this court, do annex to their reports, to be hereafter made under decrees and orders of this court, a schedule of the evidence read before them on behalf of any party, and do also state, the tender and rejection of any evidence, which they may rule to be inadmissible.

MASIERE BRADY, C.
T. B. C. SMITH, M. R.

Dated 5th April, 1847.

1. On reading the 166th general order of the 27th March, 1843, and on reading also a certificate from William Henn, Esq., and Edward Litton, Esq., two of the Masters of this court, dated 27th January, 1847, in the following words:—
"Master Litton and Master Henn, certify to the Lord Chancellor, that their mode of acting on the 166th rule of 27th March, 1843, was to note in their books the attendance of counsel, and their disapprobation when they considered the attendance of counsel unnecessary, but when they approved of such attendance they made no entry whatever; while on the other hand, Master Gould generally marked his approbation when he thought the attendance of counsel necessary, and made no entry when he considered his attendance unnecessary; and Master Townsend uniformly adopted a course similar to that of Master Gould. All the Masters would suggest that the existing rule should be modified, by authorizing to endorse upon the original summons the attendance of counsel when they considered such attendance necessary, and that the attendance of counsel should be disallowed on taxation in all cases in which no entry of approbation appears."

It is this day ordered, by the right hon. Masiere Brady, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, by and with the advice and assistance of the right hon. Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, Master of the Rolls, that on the taxation of costs, no sum whatever shall be allowed by the taxing Master, for the attendance of counsel before any of the Masters in ordinary of the court, on references under any decree or order unless the Master in ordinary shall endorse upon the original summons on which counsel shall attend, or upon the copy thereof served upon the party for whom counsel shall attend, his approbation of such attendance of counsel, and unless the said original summons or copy, with the said endorsement thereon is produced to the taxing Master. And it is further ordered, that if the Master in ordinary shall approve of the attendance of counsel, the endorsement of such approbation shall be made by the said Master, at the time such attendance shall take place. And in no case, shall the Master permit more than one counsel to attend for the same party. And it is further ordered, that in the taxation of all costs, incurred prior to the date of this order, no sum whatever shall be allowed by the taxing Master for the attendance of counsel before any of the present Masters in ordinary of the court, on such references as aforesaid, unless a certificate shall be produced to the taxing Master signed by such Master in ordinary, stating his approval of the attendance of counsel on the days and times for which such attendance shall be charged in the bill of costs. And no sum shall be allowed by the taxing Master for the attendance of counsel before the late Master Gould, or Master Townsend, on such reference as aforesaid, unless a copy of an entry in the books of the said Master Gould and Master Townsend, respectively, shall be produced to the taxing Master, as required by the 166th general order of the court.

2. And it is further ordered, that the following order be substituted for the 146th general order of the 27th March, 1843. That a receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, upon production of a certificate of his recognisance being enrolled shall be at liberty to enter the general order, that the tenants do pay their rents and arrears of rent to him, and shall cause the same to be printed and served upon the immediate tenants of the person over whose estates or property he has been appointed, or at their residences; and every receiver, sequestrator, or guardian shall be at liberty whenever rent shall be in arrear for the space of five months after the same shall have become due, in case the same is reserved by half-yearly payments, or for the space of two months, after the same shall have become due, in case it is reserved by quarterly payments, or so soon as it shall become due in case such rent is payable weekly, (or at any other time after any half-yearly or quarterly rent shall become due, if the Master shall deem it expedient to allow him to do so,) to proceed by distress, for recovery of such rent, without any rule or order for that purpose; such remedy to be deemed the proper one in the first instance; but when the receiver, sequestrator, or guardian shall find the remedy by distress insufficient, or inapplicable, he may lay the special facts before the Master, and if the Master shall deem it expedient to proceed by notice to quit, or by civil bill ejectment, process, or by ejectment for non-payment of rent, or by action at law, or by civil bill, the Master shall make an order or a report thereon as he shall see fit, and thereupon the receiver, sequestrator, or guardian shall be at liberty to proceed as the Master shall direct. And in every case in which the Master shall be of opinion that the receiver, sequestrator, or guardian shall proceed by attachment and not by distress for payment of any rent, the Master being first satisfied that such rent is in arrear, and that the general order to pay such rent to the receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, has been duly served upon the tenant against whom the attachment is sought, or that such tenant is either lessee or assignee of a lease under the court, or has himself paid, or is the assignee of one who has paid rent to the receiver for the holding in question, and that the rent although demanded by the receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, or by his agent duly authorized, has not been paid, shall be at liberty to give a certificate that an attachment shall issue for non-payment of such rent, stating to what period such rent is calculated, and the amount of the rent claimed to be due, and thereupon the Registrar shall issue an order that the tenant shall pay to such receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, the rent mentioned in such certificate to be due, the amount whereof shall be stated in such order, together with the sum of two pounds ten shillings for the cost of such certificate, order, and of the service of the same, within ten days after personal service of such order, or shew cause within the same period why an attachment should not issue against him for non-payment of said rent. And in case the same shall not be paid, or good cause shewn within said period, the clerk of the appearances and writs shall, on being satisfied by affidavit that such order was duly served, without any further rule or order, issue an attachment against such tenant for non-payment of said sums.

At the close of the last session of parliament, the Chief Secretary for Ireland announced that her Majesty's government had it in contemplation to introduce a law for the better regulation of receiverships under the Court of Chancery. The initiative of this very important subject is due to Mr. Bernal Osborne. The returns moved for by him, and laid before parliament, shew that whilst the number of estates over which receivers have been appointed has been stationary, or decreasing, the increase of the arrears due on those estates has been enormous.

Nor can this increase be attributed solely to the distress of the country. Much must be ascribed to the system, and the management of it. In proof that "the famine in the land" has not been the sole cause, we give a summary of two returns, the first from the Devon Commission, which comes down to the year 1843, and the second, that already alluded to, which has been more carefully compiled, and extends to the year 1847.

The first states the average number of causes for the years 1841, 42, 43, in the Courts of Chancery and Equity Exchequer, as 1002; the rental of the estates over which receivers had been appointed £702,822. 5s. 2d.; the arrears when appointed, £83,406. 9s. 11d.; when they last accounted, £400,206. 17s. 9½d., that is, they had considerably more than quadrupled, and this before the famine! The costs allowed to receivers amounted to £30,115. 1s. 10d. and this of course exclusive of their poundage.

The parliamentary return is more carefully compiled. The Chancery returns are given separately for the years 1844, 45, 46, 47, shewing the aggregate number of estates under the control of the court, over which receivers had been appointed, and the counties in which they are situated. The average total number for these four years would be 820 estates, with an average rental of £680,000. The arrears in 1844 amounted, at date of receiver's appointment, to but £34,559, when they accounted to £380,888, that is, they had increased more than eleven times.

Nor does the picture brighten in 1845, the arrears, at date of appointment, were £33,560; at time of reckoning, £442,902, that is, more than thirteen fold. In 1846 it grows still more gloomy; as to arrears, they had swelled at date of appointment to £207,161, but the disproportion at time of accounting was infinitely less, amounting only to £375,374. In 1847 it grows darker and darker still, the arrears at date of appointment were but £33,044; at time of accounting they had increased to £469,191. The returns from the Court of Exchequer are taken for the same period of time, but collectively, and the result shews that there are 448 estates under receivers, the rental of which amounts to £155,403, the arrears at date of appointment amounted to £61,779, and at time of reckoning to £171,839.

But these returns shew facts more startling still. The amount expended in improvements on estates under the Court of Chancery over this enormous rental, the greater part of the estates being situated in the most unimproved parts of Ireland, amounted, in the year 1844, to only £2,522, and in the three succeeding years respectively, to £4,772, £1,507, and £2,555; whilst, in the Court of Exchequer, on a rental of £155,000 a-year, one single shilling during four years, was not expended. The average expenditure in improvements during the last four years was thus but £2,851 16s. 8d. per annum, being exactly 5½d. per cent. per annum on the gross rental; but it will be found, on examination of the return, that there is over £900,000 a-year of rental, allowing for accumulations, out of which there is not one shilling expended, either in improving these neglected estates, or in any way assisting to give employment to the poor!

The regeneration of the condition of the Irish people, as an agricultural community, must be wrought through the soil of Ireland; on it they live, and move, and have their being. Is that improvement accelerated by the mode allowed to incumbrancers to realize their debts, through the medium of Courts of Equity? The lamentable results which the foregoing returns exhibit testify the contrary, and they form subject for deep and anxious consideration.

The Irish incumbrancer is, in fact, the owner of the soil; he extracts its produce, and he gives no direct return. On him the law casts no responsibility; with him property has its rights, but not its duties. It is right and just that the capitalist should have secure places for the investment of his capital, and that his capital should be returned, provided that the process for the return be just and equitable, and not ruinous and destructive. If the creditor have not power to enforce his contract, without the aid of a Court of Equity; in seeking that aid, the creditor confesses his impotency, and the court, in rendering assistance, should give it only on the terms of being omnipotent, not merely in regulating, directing, and controlling the equities between the parties, but the properties which are delegated to their care pending such adjustments. A Court of Equity should not be a mere bailee for safe custody, but in truth the great parens patrie under the arbitrium boni viri; the deposit should not only be not depreciated, it should be improved during the period of its being placed under the care of the court.

But what should be, is not. The law allows the creditor to take property from the hands of the debtor, whose responsibilities are in some degree defined, though the obligation, being an imperfect one, could not always be enforced by law. The transfer involves the creditor in no burden of proprietorship, but places the management of the estate under a Court of Equity, which has hitherto been potent for evil and powerless for good, in consequence of the system, not of the managers of it, who do much to counteract its evils.

Very many of these properties are very small; they have been placed under the dominion of Courts of Equity since the years 1836 and 1840, in consequence of the "fatal facility" given by the Judgment Acts (5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 55, and 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105), whilst the expense of appointing, and completing the appointment of a receiver, is considerable, frequently much more than the amount of the debt. We have heard, on unquestionable authority, of a sum due by a half-pay officer possessed of some very trifling property, which amounted to only £11, whilst the costs in the Receiver's matter exceeded £70. The debtor died a pauper in a workhouse!

In the counties of Armagh, Carlow, Donegal, Leitrim, Londonderry, and Monaghan, to their credit be it spoken, there were only five properties in each, under Receivers of the Court of Chancery, the aggregate rental of the thirty estates amounting to little more than £12,000 per annum. In Londonderry the rental of the five properties was only £712 14s. 6d. In the year 1847, there was only one property in Down with a Receiver under the Court of Chancery. The largest number were in Dublin, Galway, Limerick, and Tipperary. There are, however, a large number (276) in the return of the year 1847 not described as to locality. It is to be observed, that not only does the estate lose by the power of the proprietor to improve being taken from him, and vested in nobody; but it loses, likewise, in the change of men who are to act as Receivers—in one sense, truly, and yet not truly, so called; for, although their sole duty is to receive, yet even that is ill done. They are so shackled in power, so incapable of acting with promptitude, or power of adaptation to circumstances, that much less is received from the estate than was previously due by the owner, whilst the tenants were less impoverished. Nearly every proceeding by a Receiver must, if he wish to protect himself, be taken under the direction of the Master to whom the cause or matter has been referred, and this can only be done by a written, verified statement of facts, and every statement of facts causes delay and costs money; and even then there is no sufficiently controlling power, the jurisdiction of the Master is limited, and frequently an application must be made to the court; every such application causes delay and costs money, and neither Receiver, Master, nor Court can of themselves, and without the consent of creditor or inheritor, expend money in improving the properties placed under their care.

The responsibility of the office, the irksomeness of the duties, not a single pleasurable act connected with them in the way of rewarding or encouraging an industrious tenant—the difficulty of procuring solvent sureties, and the reluctance to ask friends to sign a recognizance which formed an incumbrance on their estates, whilst they are obliged to qualify on oath—the perpetual necessity of making affidavits, and the unpleasantness of serving many masters,—the Court, the great supervisor, the Master, the Director-General, the plaintiff in the cause, and every other creditor not caring a rush for the estate, provided they ever receive their money from it, whether wrung from the tenant, or from the Receiver made answerable for some loss a generous proprietor would never have charged him with, and the precariousness of the tenure of office, have all contributed to render the appointment exceedingly undesirable. In fact, no gentleman who can obtain a private agency would accept of it.

There is but one qualification for the office, the power of procuring sureties.

Formerly the amount of private jobbing in these appointments was enormous. The plaintiff, or the plaintiff's solicitor, appointed his friend without opposition—the solicitor having either become reckless, or an absentee—on an understanding that the solicitor for the receiver should be either the plaintiff's solicitor, or some one who would divide the profits. Immediately on his installation, the receiver collected every shilling in which he had not been anticipated by the proprietor, who, before bidding his last farewell to his lands, took from the tenants whatever they could give in money or kind, and gave them receipts in full. The celerity was not thereby to pay off the creditor who was badly in need of his interest, no such thing; by prudent management the time for accounting could be extended, and meantime something handsome could be realized by prudently taking a turn out of the money.

The interests of the tenant and receiver were in antagonism; the one shilling poundage could be doubled, or quadrupled, by collecting quickly, accounting very slowly.

In some degree these evils have been abated by the new rules of 1843, for which Sir Edward Sugden deserves our highest approbation.

We do not wish, for the mere sake of making out a strong case—the facts are plain, they require no colouring of ours—to deal out sweeping censures, on the contrary, we attack a system, not individuals, a system which is susceptible of improvement, and to the investigation of which we must recur again.

ORDERS IN CHANCERY SINCE 1843.

(Concluded.)

Dated 18th June, 1847.

On reading a further certificate of Masters Henn and Litton, dated the 3rd day of June, 1847, referring to the statements contained in their certificate of the 27th day of January last, in reference to the entering by Masters Townsend and Gould, in their books of the attendance of counsel before them, it is this day ordered, by the right honorable Masters Brady, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, by and with the advice and assistance of the right hon. Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, Master of the Rolls, that number one of the general orders, bearing date the 5th of April, 1847, be amended, by adding thereto the following words:—"or a certificate shall be produced to the taxing master, of either Master Henn or Master Litton, certifying that having examined the briefs used on the occasion, the case appeared to them to have been a fit one for the employment of counsel."

MAZIERE BRADY, C.
T. B. C. SMITH, M. R.

Dated 22nd May, 1848.

It is ordered, by the right hon. the Master of the Rolls, that in all cases where a motion is made at the Rolls, to make a consent a rule of court, purporting to be made between all the parties in the cause, there shall be a certificate at foot of, or endorsed on, the consent, signed by the solicitor for the party on whose behalf the motion is made to the following effect, or as near thereto, as the circumstances of each case will admit.

"I hereby certify, that I have carefully compared the title of this consent with the Rolls certificate, (or certificates,) and that it corresponds therewith; and I further certify, that this consent has been signed by, or on behalf of all the parties in the causes and matters in the title hereof mentioned, save and except (here name the persons if any, who have not signed.)"

And if there shall have been a decree to account in any of such causes, and any person shall have proved a demand thereunder, and such consent shall seek to transfer or pay over, any stock or cash, add after the words "all the parties" the words "and all persons who have proved under the decree."

It is further ordered by the right hon. the Master of the Rolls, that when a motion shall be made at the Rolls, for the transfer of any stock or the payment of any money out of Court, or by the receiver, and the motion shall be grounded on a report of the Master, or a decree, or on both, whereby the priorities of the several parties and creditors, or incumbrancers are ascertained, there shall be a certificate at foot of, or endorsed on, the notice of motion, signed by the solicitor for the party on whose behalf the motion shall be made, to the following effect, or as near thereto as the circumstances of the case will admit.

"I hereby certify, that I have compared this notice with the Master's report, (or decree, or both, as the case may be,) and I further certify, that the stock sought to be transferred (or the money sought to be paid out of Court, or by the receiver, or as the case may be) is sought to be transferred (or paid as the case may be) in exact accordance with the rights and priorities of the several parties, as ascertained by the said report (or decree, or both as the case may be.)"

And if the notice is not framed in exact conformity with such report or decree, add these words "save in the following particulars," and then describe with perfect accuracy, wherein the notice varies from such report or decree.

T. B. C. SMITH, M. R.

10th, April, 1848.

The Lord Chancellor desires that a list of short causes be made out in each term to be heard on the second Thursday in term and following days. That causes set down or bills and answer only, or on reports unexcepted to, or on returns to commissioners of petitions be considered as short causes within this rule, and all other causes in which the solicitor for the party setting down the cause shall hand to the Registrar the certificate of counsel that it is not from its nature, likely to take time, and is fit to be heard as a short cause.

MASSEY BRADY, G.

IN LUNACY.

August 21st, 1848.

It is ordered by the Lord Chancellor, that, in the letting of lands the property of lunatics or idiots, the Masters, Committees and Receivers shall have regard to the provisions of the 23rd and 24th sections of the statute 11 G. 4, and 1 W. 4, c. 65; and that (unless in special cases, and on special grounds, to be approved of by the Lord Chancellor) no lease of such lands shall be made dependent on the duration of the matter of such lunacy or idiocy; but every such lease shall be made for some certain term, so far as the estate and powers of the lunatic or idiot will admit;—it appearing to the Lord Chancellor that it will be for the benefit of the estates of such lunatics or idiots that the leases thereof should have such certainty of duration: and such term shall not in any case be less than twenty-one years, unless otherwise especially ordered: and every such lease, where the Master shall not otherwise direct, shall contain proper clauses, to be approved of by him, for preventing the assignment or subletting of the lands demised, in addition to the other clauses and covenants to be inserted therein pursuant to the present general orders.

MASSEY BRADY, G.

The word "Member" shall mean any person entitled to a share of the assets or accruing profits of any such company at the time of presenting the petition for dissolving the same or winding up the affairs thereof under this act: The expression "Constitution of a company" shall mean every deed of partnership or settlement, charter, act of parliament, regulations, or other instrument whatsoever, including any bye laws, by or under which the business of the same is or was, or is or was intended to be carried on:

The word "Contributory" shall include every member of a company, and also every other person liable to contribute to the payment of any of the debts, liabilities, or losses thereof, whether as heir, devisee, executor, or administrator of a deceased member, or as a former member of the same, or of heir, devisee, executor, or administrator of a former member of the same, deceased, or otherwise howsoever:

The word "Call" shall mean a demand or requisition upon contributories of a company made or to be made for a contributory payment towards the funds or assets thereof, or for or towards the payment or discharge of any of the debts, liabilities, or losses of such company or otherwise:

The word "Creditor" shall include every person having any debt or demand enforceable against any company in any court of law or Equity, or for nonpayment or non-satisfaction of which damages could be recovered:

The word "Person" shall include corporations:

The words "the court" shall mean Her Majesty's High Court of Chancery in England or Ireland (as the case may be) before which any proceeding under this act shall take place:

The word "Master" shall mean the master in ordinary of the court for the time being acting in any matter under this act:

The word "Fiat" shall include any commission of bankruptcy which shall be issued in Ireland, and the words "Court of bankruptcy" shall include any commissioner acting in the prosecution of any such commission of bankrupt in Ireland, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland sitting in bankruptcy:

The words "Order absolute" shall mean the order absolute for the dissolution and winding-up, or for the winding-up, as the case may be, of any company under this act:

And every word importing the singular number only, shall extend to several persons or things, as well as to one person or thing, and every word importing the plural number only, shall extend to one person or thing, as well as to several persons or things, and every word importing the masculine gender only, shall extend to a female as well as to a male.

4. That in citing this act, it shall be sufficient to use the expression "The Joint Stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1848."

5. That any person who shall be, or claim to be a contributor of a company, may present a petition to the Lord Chancellor, or to the Master of the Rolls in a summary way, for the dissolution and winding-up, or for the winding-up of the affairs of such company, in any of the following cases:—

1. If any company shall have committed any act, which under the said recited acts or any of them would be deemed an act of bankruptcy:

2. If any company shall, by a resolution passed at a meeting of such company, or of the directors, summoned in that behalf, have filed in the office of the Lord Chancellor's Secretary of bankrupts, a declaration in writing that the said company is unable to meet its engagements:

3. If any person shall have recovered judgment in any action personal, for the recovery of any demand in any of Her Majesty's courts of Record, against any such company, or against any person authorized to be sued as the nominal defendant on their behalf, or against any one or more of the members or contributories of such company, acting or sued in the name, or on behalf of the other members or contributories, and shall be in a situation to sue out execution upon such judgment, and same shall not be restrained or suspended by any rule of any court, and there shall be nothing due from the plaintiff which may be set off against such judgment, and if within ten days after notice in writing served upon a chief clerk or secretary, or registrar of the said company, or if there be no such officer, then either on any director of the said company, personally or by the same having been left at the head or only office for the time being of such company, requiring immediate payment of such judgment debt, such company shall not have paid, secured, or compounded for the same:

4. If any decree, or order shall have been pronounced in any cause depending in any court of equity, or any order made in any matter of bankruptcy or lunacy, against such company, or against any person authorized to be sued as the nominal defendant on their behalf or against any one or more of the members or contributories thereof, ordering any sum of money to be paid, and such company shall not have paid same when same ought to be paid:

5. If any action shall have been brought in any court or record against any contributory for any demand due or claimed to be due from or by such company, and such company shall not, within ten days after notice in writing by such contributory of such action served upon the company in manner herein-before directed with respect to any judgment debt, have paid, secured, or compounded for such demand, or procured such action to be stayed, or shall not have indemnified the defendant to his satisfaction against such action, and all costs, damages, and expenses to be incurred by him by reason of the same:

6. If any creditor of a company to the amount requisite to support a fiat shall have filed an affidavit in any superior court of law at Westminster or Dublin, that such debt is justly due to him from the said company, and shall have sued out of the said court a writ of summons or other writ against such company, or any person authorized to be sued on behalf of such company, or against any one or more of the members or contributories thereof in the name of the other members or contributories, and shall have given notice of same as before directed, and such company shall not within three weeks after service of such notice have paid, secured, or compounded for such debt to the satisfaction of such creditor, or have made it appear to the satisfaction of one of the judges of the court out of which such writ shall have issued that it is the intention of such company to defend the action upon the merits, and shall not within three weeks next after service of such notice have caused an appearance to be entered to such action in the proper court in which the same shall have been brought:

7. If any company shall be dissolved, or cease to carry on business, or carry on business only for the purpose of winding up its affairs, and the same shall not be completely wound up:

8. Or if in any other matter or thing shall be shown which in the opinion of the court shall render it just and equitable that the company should be dissolved.

6. That in case any fiat shall have issued against any company under any of said acts, no petition shall be presented for the dissolution and winding up or winding up of such company under this act by any person other than creditors assignees of the estate and effects of such company, who may by the order of the court of bankruptcy (but not otherwise,) present a petition to the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls, for the winding up of such company under this act, and such order shall be a sufficient ground for such petition; and upon an order for the winding up of such company by the court of Chancery the court of bankruptcy shall make upon the proceedings under the fiat a memorandum of such order of the court of bankruptcy, and the said proceedings shall be deposited with the master to whom the matter shall be referred by the court of Chancery, provided, that the master may dispense with such deposit.

7 That all proceedings, accounts and matters in the prosecution of any fiat, before order absolute under this act, shall, for the purposes of winding up under this act, be as valid as the same would have been under the said fiat, and any pending proceedings, accounts, and matters under such fiat may be concluded under this act.

8. That every petition and proceeding under this act shall be intitled "in the matter of Joint Stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1848," and in the matter of the company to which such petition or proceeding shall relate, describing such company by its most usual style or firm, until any order absolute under this act, and after any such order then by the style by which such company shall have been designated in such order absolute.

9. That no order absolute, nor any order or proceeding under this act shall be impeached by reason of any of the petitioners being afterwards discovered not duly qualified to present the petition on which the order absolute shall have been made; provided that a petition may be presented under this act by some person duly qualified, praying to have the benefit of the former proceedings, and to be allowed to prosecute same.

10. That every petition for dissolution and winding-up or for winding-up under this act shall be advertised once in the London Gazette, and served, at the head office of the company, upon any member, officer, or servant of the company there, or in case no such member, &c. can be found there, then by been left at such office, or in case no such office can be found, then upon any member, &c. of the company: provided that no petition by direction of the court of bankruptcy, nor any order thereon, shall require advertisement, and in case no office of the company, nor any member, &c. can be found, the court may hear and make any order on such petition on production of the London Gazette containing such advertisement as aforesaid, and without proof that such petition has been served in manner aforesaid.

11. That the court may at the hearing direct any such petition, whether served or not, to stand over, and direct such service of the petition as shall seem meet.

12. That on any petition the court may require any parties to show cause, why the company should not be dissolved and wound up or wound up under this act, or may make a conditional order or refer it to the master to make inquiry and in case no sufficient cause be shown, or in case the terms of such conditional order be not fulfilled, or it shall appear from the master's report, that the dissolution and winding-up or the winding up of any such company under this act is necessary or expedient, may make such order absolute as hereafter mentioned.

13. That the court may, before making any order absolute, direct the application or performance, either wholly or in part, of any provisions contained in the constitution of the company towards the purposes of such dissolution or winding up.

14. That the court, on the hearing of any such petition, may dismiss such petition with or without costs, or to make an order absolute for the dissolution, &c., and by such order it shall be referred to one of the masters to wind up the affairs of the company under this act.

15. That the date, title, and ordering part of every order of the court made upon any such petition, previously to and including the order absolute, shall, within twelve days after the date thereof, be advertised once in the London Gazette, and be served as the court shall direct.

16. That from the date of any order absolute for dissolution, or from any date to be therein fixed for that purpose, the company therein specified shall be absolutely dissolved.

17. That the petitioner on whose petition an order absolute shall be obtained shall without delay carry in the same before the master; and in default of his so doing in ten days next after the date of such order any person being or claiming to be a contributory may present his petition, praying to have the carriage of said order absolute, and such order shall be made as to the court shall appear just; and it shall be sufficient to serve such petition either upon the petitioner who obtained the order absolute, or upon his solicitor.

18. That the court, in any decree or order for the dissolution of a company, association or partnership, and also by any order after a decree for the dissolution of a company, &c., may order that the affairs of such company, &c., shall be wound up under this act, and the costs of same shall be paid and recovered under this act, and any such decree or order shall, if the court shall so direct, be deemed an order absolute under this act.

19. That from the date of any order absolute it shall not be lawful for the directors, members, or officers of the company in respect of which same shall have been made to convey, assign, pay, or otherwise dispose of any of the property, monies, or other effects of the company otherwise than by the direction of the master.

20. That until an official manager shall be appointed, as herein-after mentioned, and when there shall be no official manager, the master may in any case, immediately upon the order absolute being brought in before him, appoint by writing under his hand an interim or provisional manager of the property, &c., of such company, or of such part as the master shall think fit; and the person so appointed shall have all the powers and authorities usually exercised by receivers in a suit, together with all powers and authorities exercised by any official manager under this act, except so far as the master shall otherwise direct; and such person shall act under the direction of the master, in collecting receiving and disposing of the property, &c., of such company, and such interim manager may, under the direction of the master, signified by writing under his hand, apply any part of the monies, &c., collected, or got in by him in the discharge of any judgment debt against such company; and the master may fix the amount and nature of the security of such interim manager, and also appoint any person to be interim manager without any security, provided that upon the appointment of an official manager under this act all the powers and authorities of such interim manager shall cease, and such interim manager shall deliver up and pay to the official manager all the goods, monies, &c., of such company come to his hands as such interim manager, together with all books, &c., relating thereto, and the master may make an order, directing such delivery and payment, and for vacating any recognizances entered into by such interim manager and his surety: provided that no action, or other proceeding shall be instituted or prosecuted by or against any such interim manager, as representing the company, otherwise than by the style and designation of the official manager of the company; and that every such action, &c., shall be instituted and prosecuted, as if an official manager of the company had been already appointed, and were a party to same, nor shall same abate by reason of the appointment of an official manager, but shall be carried on by or against him.

21. That upon any order absolute being carried in before the master, or upon the death, removal, or resignation of any official manager, the master shall forthwith direct the party having the carriage of the order, to insert an advertisement in two successive numbers of the London Gazette, and also in such two or more newspapers as the master shall appoint, giving notice that the master will proceed, at a day, hour, and place to be stated in such advertisement, such day to be within fourteen days from the publication of the first advertisement, to appoint an official manager, and previously to the making out such list of contributories as herein-after mentioned all persons being or claiming to be contributories of such company, and after the making out of such list all persons appearing on same shall be entitled to attend, and offer proposals or objections as to such appointment; and the master may adjourn the appointment of any official manager same to be stated to the parties present, and it shall not be requisite to give notice of such adjournment by advertisement.

22. That at the time and place to be fixed in such advertisement, or at any other time or place to which the appointment of an official manager shall have been adjourned, the master shall, by writing under his hand, appoint an official manager of the company, and the master shall have power, at his discretion, but subject to any special direction of the court, to remove, by writing under his hand, any such official manager, and thereupon, and also upon the death or resignation of any official manager, to appoint any other person in his stead; and such official manager may be either any contributory of any company, or the assignee in bankruptcy of any company, being bankrupt, or of any bankrupt member or contributory of the same.

23. That in making the first or any subsequent appointment of an official manager, the master may adopt the proposal of any party attending him; and the proposal of any of the parties who shall have appeared before the court shall not be entitled on that account to any preference; and the master may appoint any person whom he shall think proper, although not proposed by any of the parties.

24. That upon the appointment of any official manager, or within such period as the master directs the official manager, and two or more persons as his sureties, to be approved of by the master, shall enter into a recognizance as in the schedule hereto set forth, or otherwise as the court by any general order, or by any special order, shall direct, and in such sum as the master shall direct (but not to exceed by more than one thousand pounds the greatest sum or value which in the judgment of the master the official manager shall be likely to have at any one time in his hands,) for the duly accounting for all monies, &c., which shall come to his hands, and the recognizance of the official manager shall be for the whole amount of the sum to be so fixed, and the recognizances of the sureties shall be either joint or several for the whole or any portion of said sum, but the total amount of the recognizances shall not be less than the sum in which the official manager shall be bound; and upon the death, bankruptcy, or insolvency of any surety the master may require recognizances in his place; and may require additional recognizances by the official manager and his sureties, and upon the breach of the condition of any recognizances, the same shall under an order of the master, be put in force by the official manager, or by any contributory of the company, in like manner as the recognizances of receivers of the Court of Chancery; and the master, after any person shall have ceased to be official manager, and his final account shall have been passed, and any balance due thereon paid, to order such recognizance to be vacated.

25. That in case default shall be made by the official manager in accounting for what he shall receive as such, or in paying same as the master shall direct, the master may require the official manager and his sureties, to pay to such person, and within such time as the master shall appoint, the whole or any portion of the sum in which they shall have become bound by recognizance: provided that nothing herein contained shall extend the liability of any surety beyond the sum in which he became individually bound on his recognizance.

26. That notwithstanding anything herein-before contained, the master may accept the security of any guarantee society established by charter or act of parliament in any part of Great Britain, in lieu of the security of such sureties as aforesaid.

27. That every appointment and removal of an official manager shall be valid without confirmation by the court, unless otherwise ordered in the particular matter; and every such appointment, and removal shall be advertised in the London Gazette, and in such newspaper as the master shall think proper.

28. That immediately after the appointment of an official manager the master shall, direct all the books of account, deeds, cash, &c., and writings of the company to be delivered up to the official manager, and upon the appointment of any new official manager all the same matters shall be delivered over to him: provided that the master may make such order as he shall think fit relative to the custody or deposit, of such books of account, &c.

29. That on every appointment of an official manager all the estate, effects, credits, and rights of action of the company, and all powers which might be exercised by an official manager, shall, except so far as the master shall, by writing under his hand, direct to the contrary, become absolutely vested in the official manager, either solely, or jointly with any other official manager, as joint tenants; and when, according to any laws now in force, any conveyance or assignment of real or personal property vested in any official manager under this act would require to be registered, then the order absolute, together with the first appointment of an official manager, shall be registered in the registry office, wherein such registry or assignment would require to be registered; and the registry hereby directed shall have the like effect as the registry of any such conveyance or assignment would have had; and the title of any purchaser of any such property for valuable consideration, or of any mortgagee thereof without fraud, who shall have duly registered his purchase or mortgage deed previously to the registry hereby directed, shall not be invalidated by such order absolute or appointment: provided that if the master shall, by writing under his hand, direct that any of the said estate, &c. shall not vest in the official manager, the court, or the master, may at any time after discharge or vary such direction, and thereupon the estate, &c., comprised in such direction shall, either wholly or to the extent to which the same shall be so discharged, become vested in the official manager.

30. That when any order shall have been made on petition, by direction of the Court of Bankruptcy, for winding up under this act the affairs of any company, all the estate, &c. of the bankrupt company for the time being, vested in the assignees in bankruptcy shall, upon the appointment of an official manager, unless otherwise provided by the order absolute, become absolutely vested in such official manager, together with all the powers an official manager might exercise in any matter instituted under this act in which the company had not become bankrupt.

31. That until the issuing of any general orders by this act authorized to be made, the practice of the court with respect to receivers and managers of partnership estates shall, subject to the provisions of this act, and to any special orders or directions relative to the official manager, with respect to any particular company, (and which the court and the master are hereby authorized to make,) apply to every official manager under this act.

32. That the court may allow remuneration, by way of percentage or otherwise, to the official manager, and to any receiver to be appointed as herein-before provided, and increase or diminish same.

33. That the official manager, with the approbation of the master, may employ, and from time to time dismiss an attorney or solicitor.

34. That the official manager shall proceed, under the directions of the master, in the making up, continuing, completing, and rectifying the books of account of the company, and in providing and keeping all other books of account necessary for showing the debts and credits of the company, including a ledger, which shall contain the separate accounts of the contributories, (and in which every contributory shall be debited with the amount payable by him in respect of any call to be made as hereby provided,) and in balancing such books and accounts of the contributories, in getting in, and converting the estate and assets, and winding up the affairs of the same company, in paying the debts as herein provided, and in dividing and distributing the surplus assets of the company amongst the parties entitled, and in bringing before the master all questions necessary to be determined and settled in order to the winding up of the affairs of the company; and the official manager shall, without the necessity of any proposal in writing, take the directions of the master with reference to all proceedings necessary to be taken for the complete winding-up of the affairs of the company.

35. That the accounts of the official manager and receiver if any, shall be passed before the master, and vouched as he shall direct; and that the contributories shall only be at liberty to surcharge and falsify such accounts.

36. That the official manager shall make, in books provided by him for that purpose, true entries of all matters and proceedings in the winding-up of the affairs of the company; and such books shall be kept in the custody of the official manager, and shall on all occasions on which the master is required to proceed in the matter of such company be produced before the master.

37. That upon any order absolute being brought before the master for consideration, he shall, after insertion of the advertisement relative to the appointment of an official manager, determine what parties shall attend him in the proceedings under such order absolute; and the master may direct any other contributories to attend him, and the master, with the consent in writing of the majority in number and interest, of the persons to be represented, may appoint and remove any contributories to watch the proceedings of the liquidation, as representatives of the contributories in general, or such as the master shall be of opinion ought to be so represented: and all the proper parties shall in manner hereinafter mentioned be served with notice of all proceedings before the master: and the costs incurred by all such parties, except so far as the master shall otherwise direct, shall be part of the general costs of winding up the company under this act.

38. That all contributories shall, at their own expense, receive notice, as the master shall direct, the proceedings in the matter of the dissolved company, and at their own expense may attend the proceedings; and any contributor may, at his own expense, submit any proposal before the master in relation to the affairs of such company.

39. That if any contributory shall be an idiot or lunatic he shall be entitled to attend, and shall be sufficiently represented by his committee; and if any contributory shall be a minor, he shall be entitled to attend, and shall be sufficiently represented by his father or guardian, or by his mother, or next friend to be appointed by the master provided that the master may appoint a guardian of a contributory being a minor, or a representative of any contributory being a lunatic, but not found so by commission for the purposes of any winding-up under this act.

DUBLIN, JANUARY 6, 1849.

THE practice of granting leases for lives, with covenants for perpetual renewal—a mode of tenure peculiar to Ireland—has given occasion to an incalculable amount of litigation, and been most unsatisfactory both to landlord and tenant. The legal interest thus created was a mongrel, and no one will regret its extinction, or, rather, conversion into a known and legitimate mode of tenure. There was an uncertainty about the interest that was exceedingly uncomfortable to the lessee; for him, lives always dropped inopportunately, whilst to the landlord they appeared perfectly patriarchal. Forfeitures were incurred, that could only be relieved against by tenantry acts and courts of equity; or, if not, fines swelled to enormous proportions, being increased beyond all natural limits by a septennial computation which we never could well understand, with the addition of all possible kinds of interest. But, nevertheless, leases for lives renewable for ever were favourites. Landlords were proprietors of large tracts, and had no duties to perform, or responsibilities to fulfil. The very uncertainty of the tenure lent them a charm to the lessee; the selection of an octogenarian was interesting to the natural land-leased philosopher, who became as knowing in discerning men of longevity and long-lived families, as in the points of a horse; the words, renewable for ever, fell pleasantly upon the ear—semi-landlordism arising from an estate which, though dead, was yet of its own inherent nature, capable of resuscitation—whose animation, though long suspended, was yet susceptible of renewed life and vigour. It was something more than equivocal generation, electricity, or galvanism—a discovery in law unattainable in other sciences. It led, too, to a numerous offspring of sub-infeudations; lessees were generous, and granted a term as good as their own to sublessees. They have, to be sure, latterly found it inconvenient, there being the same lives, the same estate—no reversion, therefore, no distress or action of ejectment* maintainable. And thus a combination of legal inconveniences and anomalous landlord relationships has forewarned the termination of an existence which the legislature has doomed, and last session was introduced a bill, to “convert the renewable leasehold tenure of lands in Ireland into a tenure in fee.”

It was withdrawn, but only for the Session, principally in consequence of the opposition of Mr. Law on behalf of the Irish Society; but the interests of no public body can be allowed to impede the enactment of so desirable a measure. It is perfectly right those interests should be considered, and if affected, the owners should be compensated, but they cannot be allowed to stay legislation of so generally useful a character.

We purpose to give an outline of the way in which this important change in the law is to be effected. The bill proposes to convert all tenures of

* This is to be understood as applying to replevin or ejectment suits, arising merely from the relation of landlord and tenant. In Pluck v. Digges (2 H. & Br. 21, & C. 5 Bligh P.C., N. S. 31) it is apprehended the replevin was not maintainable, if the avowry had been special, (there being a clause of distress in the lease to the plaintiff,) and not the common avowry, arising from the relation of landlord and tenant, which it was decided did not exist in that case. In a case, argued in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, in Trinity or Michaelmas Term, 1844, similar in facts to that of Pluck v. Digges, except that the action was in ejectment and not replevin, which, much to the loss of the profession, has never been reported, and the name of which, we believe, was Leusen Porter v. Welsh, it was held by Brady, C.B., Pennefather, B., and Richards, B., that there must be a reversion, in the absence of any express covenant to entitle the landlord to his action of ejectment. Lefroy, B., after a masterly review of the authorities, in a judgment that to our mind then appeared conclusive, held that there was a common law right of entry, consequently that the action was maintainable, but that he was bound by the decision of the House of Lords in Pluck v. Digges.

the nature we have described into fee-farms, adding to the rent the probable average amount of the renewal fines. The machinery by which the conversion is to be made, is the following:—The owner of a lease in perpetuity petitions the Court of Equity Exchequer, who by side bar rule refer the matter to the Chief Remembrancer, who is empowered to give notice to all persons interested in the lease, and, having ascertained its terms, to compute the yearly average of the renewal fines, which computed average is to become the amount of the fee-farm rent. All under-lessees in perpetuity are to have notice of the proceedings, and may, within one month after notice, come into the office and acquire a fee-farm tenure in the lands comprised in their under-leases. When the Chief Remembrancer's Report has been confirmed—it may be varied on motion without taking exceptions—the leasehold interests, whether legal or equitable, shall be enlarged into a legal estate or estates of inheritance in fee, subject to the fee-farm rent included in the Report, and subject also, “and without prejudice, to any estates, rights, titles, or interests, which shall never have been bound at law or in equity by the lease in perpetuity.”

This is an awkward mode of expression; and the act, in the subsequent sections, is tediously and unnecessarily minute in defining what interests are not to be affected, or what changes are to be wrought by the conversion of the quality of the estate.

A few expressive words, that no existing rights were to be displaced, and that subject thereto, and to the computed rent, the estates created were to have all the incidents of estates in fee, would be simpler and better, with the exception of one very proper and important provision—that owners of the rent may recover in ejectment. This, we think, could, with great benefit to the community, be extended to cases of fee farm grants, whether created by conversion under the statute, or by the original conveyance. The decision of Pluck v. Digges, though no doubt very sound in point of law, was very injurious in point of practice.

The 20th section of the bill is as follows:—“That every fee-farm rent made payable under the provisions of this act shall be recoverable by all or any of the ways, means, or remedies, which, according to any law or statute now in force in Ireland, or hereafter, is, are, or shall be provided for the recovery of any rent service reserved upon any lease for life, or for years, executed by any landlord or person seised in fee simple, and subject to all the like rules and regulations by statute or otherwise, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.”

The act gives a right of redeeming after judgment in ejectment, and execution executed, to the owner of the fee-farm within six months, or to the owner of an inferior fee-farm, or the owner of the lands out of which the rent is payable, within nine months; and in the event of such redemption being made by such last-mentioned parties, or a mortgagee, or other person now entitled to redeem under the ejectment statutes, declares that all sums of money so paid shall be the first charge, not only upon the estate or interest of the person making default, but also upon the inheritance of the rent, save only where charges are created under the Drainage Acts.

This unequivocally establishes the right of salvage, which would, we think, be otherwise open to some doubt. In Angell v. Bryan (2 Jon. & Lat. 763), Sir Edward Sugden, C., decided that a person who had advanced money to pay rent, and then took a mortgage of the land for the amount, was not, as a salvage creditor, entitled to any priority; in Burroughs v. Molloy (1d. 521), he held a similar opinion with respect to advances by a mortgagee. In Brice v. Montgomery (Wallis, Rep. Lyne. 325) the landlord, having advanced money to his tenant to secure the arrears of a fee-farm rent due to himself, was declared to have priority over a prior charge on the same lands. Whatever be the existing state of the law, the legislature, we trust, will, when the bill shall be again before them, carry into effect this useful provision.

The 19th section provides that if persons hereafter shall be so self-willed as to grant leases, with covenants for perpetual renewal, that all such leases shall operate as a conveyance at a fee-farm rent, at the rent reserved, increased by one-seventh of the renewal fine.

We would suggest, as the most effectual extinguisher of such leases, the omission of that part of the section which gives the landlord the one-seventh of the fine.

The framers of the statute have been sufficiently gallant to provide expressly that the right of dower shall attach upon lands when once converted to fee farms.

On the whole, the measure has been carefully drawn, but we think it capable of, and that it would be improved by, abridgment. We trust soon to see it amongst the acts of 1849, and shall accept it as a measure of useful law reform.

THE case of Fulton v. Farran, reported in a former number, p. 66, has satisfactorily established the practice, that after a charging order has been obtained and made absolute upon a fund in court, the creditor can obtain the funds so charged by motion, and without the necessity of filing a bill. The summary jurisdiction of the court will, however, only be applied in those cases where the right of the creditor is clear—at least, the principal case only goes to that extent; but it is probable, the practice having been once established, the jurisdiction will in simple cases be extended still further, and be applied to those where there are several creditors and no contest as to rights. There does not appear to be any difficulty, in such instances, in either making the order for payment, or having a sub-allocation report of the priorities and charges of the creditors upon a particular fund, which they have charged under the statute.

The decision is one obviously of much practical importance, even without regard to its capability of extension, and restores the rule made by the present Chief Justice when Master of the Rolls, in Burke v. Burke, (7 Ir. E. R. 174,) the authority of which, it was feared, had been shaken by the later English decisions of Sir Launcelot Shadwell and Lord Langdale. The effect of the opinion of the learned Judge in Whitfield v. Prickett, (13 Sim. 259), and Wastell v. Leslie, (15 Sim. 45.) was, that he could only grant a stop order in the usual terms, and the same restricted operation was attributed to the English statute by Lord Langdale in Newton v. Askew, (12 Jur. 786.) In the first case no person appeared for the respondent in the petition matter; the next case was opposed, but it does not appear on what grounds; it may have been therefore that the petitioners right to the fund was disputed. It should be observed that in the last case there appears to have been a serious question of right, there being an appeal to the Lords against the judgment on which the charging order was founded; that there was also a doubt whether that particular security (redeemed annuities) was within the meaning of the act, (1 & 2 Vic. c. 110, 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, Ir.) and further, that the question was not properly before the English Master of the Rolls, the fund not being in court.

The inconvenience of adopting the English rule—if from the foregoing review of the authorities it can be affirmed to be settled there, and if settled, it arose, in a great measure, from a difference in the practice of the Equity Courts there and here; in England it not being the practice to make sub-allocations on cross motions, whilst in this country it is—is manifest, for thus in every simple and trifling case the creditor would have been obliged to resort to the tedious and expensive process of filing a bill to establish a right which was incontestable, or admitted of no controversy. In fact, the narrow construction given to this section of the statute in England has frittered away its benefit. The summary jurisdiction by motion is more extensively used in this country, and to the benefit of the suitor. The creditor obtains relief speedily, the funds are less burdened with costs, which is no small benefit likewise to the honest debtor. All that a Court of Equity wanted was to get the fund under its dominion; having attained that, it knew how to distribute it. What purpose was gained by rendering it necessary to file a bill to establish an Equity which was already settled? It is satisfactory that the practice of our Equity Courts does not clash with the true and broad construction of the act; and we were anxious promptly to call the attention of the professions to a decision which places this branch of the law on its proper basis.

40. That every party who shall attend before the master state to the master whether he appears in person or by solicitor; and if in person he shall state his name and address, and if by solicitor the name and address of his solicitor, and also any new solicitor; and same shall be entered in the master's book of proceedings; and notice of all proceedings shall be sufficiently given by service upon the party or upon his solicitor.

41. That if the proceedings before the master, not being proper to be taken by the official manager, shall not be prosecuted with due diligence, or if for any reason it shall appear advisable, the master, upon the application of any contributory, may commit to him the further prosecution thereof; and if any official manager shall not prosecute the proceedings with due diligence, any contributory may apply to the master, who shall give necessary directions, and remove, if he think fit, such official manager.

42. That after any order on petition under this act, the death of the petitioner or party shall not abate the proceeding; but the Court and the master, after an order absolute brought in before him, upon the application of any party interested, supported by evidence, and if made to the court by way of motion, may direct that the further prosecution of the proceedings to be committed to such party as the master shall think proper; and the costs of such application, and of the deceased party, shall, if the court or master so direct, be part of the general costs of winding up the company under this act.

43. That all proceedings before the master under this act shall be proceeded in, not by state of facts and proposal, but by proposal in writing, or as the master shall direct, to be supported, if need be, by evidence: provided that the master may direct the parties before him to proceed by a state of facts in writing.

44. That the master may dispense with any warrants under the order of reference, and direct any warrants to be taken out and prosecuted before him, and fix the time at which same shall be returnable, or any proceeding shall be taken, and proceed de die in diem.

45. That the master may, with or without notice to any party, adjourn proceedings before him under this act, either de die in diem, or to any other time and place to be fixed by the master.

46. That the master may order the advertisement in the London Gazette or otherwise, or the service on any person as he shall think fit.

47. That the master shall, on request of any party interested, give certificates of any decisions or matters transacted in the winding up of any company under this act.

48. That, subject to the control of the master, all contributories shall be entitled, without fee, to inspect all the books of the company, or of the official manager or receiver, and to take copies or abstracts thereof.

49. That as between the contributories the books, &c. of the company, until the order absolute, and of the official manager or receiver after such order, shall be prima facie evidence of all matters therein contained.

50. That after the appointment of any official manager all actions, and proceedings at law or in equity, by or on behalf of the company, shall be commenced and prosecuted by the official manager by the style of "the official manager" of such company, (describing it as in the order absolute,) as the nominal plaintiff, and that all debts against the estate of any bankrupt or insolvent debtor to the company shall be proved by the official manager, and that all actions, suits, and proceedings at law or in equity, to be instituted by any persons, whether contributories or otherwise, against such company, shall be instituted and prosecuted against the official manager (by such style and designation as aforesaid).

51. That all indictments and prosecutions on behalf of such company, for any stealing or embezzlement of any money, &c., or other property of such company, or for any fraud &c., or offence against such company or the property thereof, whether same have taken place before or after his appointment, shall be carried on by the official manager; and in all such indictments, &c., it shall be sufficient to state the money, &c. of such company to be the money or property of the official manager by such style and designation as aforesaid; and any forgery, &c. committed against such company shall in such indictment, be laid or stated to have been committed against the official manager of such company, by such designation as aforesaid; and any such offender may thereupon be lawfully convicted; and in all other allegations or proceedings, in which it otherwise might be necessary to state the names of the persons composing such company, it shall be sufficient to state the style and designation of the official manager.

52. That where any action or proceeding shall be pending against the company or the nominal defendant on behalf of such company, the plaintiff may substitute the official manager as the defendant by entering a suggestion on the roll to that effect in such action, and by obtaining in such suit an order on motion or petition, without notice, and the plaintiff may prosecute same against the official manager, and have the same benefit of any order, &c. obtained, as if such action, &c. had been commenced against the official manager as defendant under this act.

53. That where any action, &c. shall be pending on behalf of the company, or by any member or contributory suing in the name of himself and the other members or contributories, such plaintiff may substitute the official manager of the company as the plaintiff, by entering a suggestion on the roll in such action, and by obtaining an order in such suit, to be obtained on motion or petition without notice, and the official manager may thenceforward prosecute such action, &c. as if same had been commenced by the official manager under this act.

54. That the death, resignation, or removal of the official manager shall not abate or prejudice any action or proceeding under this act.

55. That the official manager may, under the direction of the master, compromise any right or demand which the company may have against any person, and to which the company may be liable, and also any action or suit brought by or against the official manager on behalf of the company, and also submit to arbitration any dispute affecting the estate, rights or liabilities of the company, and upon any award, perform and give effect to same.

56. That all orders and decrees made in any suit in any court of equity against the official manager shall have the like effect upon and against the property of the company, and the persons and property of every contributory as if same had been made against the company, or the nominal defendant on behalf of same, or as if every contributory were before the court as a party to such suit; and the court by which same shall have been made, may direct that such decree against such official manager be enforced against every contributory or class of contributories, to the extent of their legal or equitable liabilities, and upon order for that purpose upon motion ex parte, but in open court, such decree shall, after seven days notice to the person sought to be charged, be enforced and executed accordingly.

57. That all judgments in any action at law against the official manager shall have the like effect against the property of such company, the persons and property of the contributories, and shall be enforced in like manner, as if such judgments had been entered up against such company, or against any person authorized to be sued on behalf of the same.

58. Provided that except as is by this act provided, nothing in this act nor any petition or order for the dissolution and winding-up or for the winding up of any company, shall extend, alter, or affect the rights of creditors, or other persons, or the rights of creditors being contributories, but being creditors of the company upon a distinct and independent account, whether against the company or against any of the contributories, nor the rights of the company against any contributories or other persons, nor any contracts or engagements entered into by or with the company, or any person on behalf of same, previously to any such petition, nor any actions, or other proceedings pending at the date of such petition.

59. That no judgment, &c. to be obtained against the official manager of any company, shall be executed against the person or property of such official manager, otherwise than as a contributory, and that every official manager shall be fully indemnified, out of the assets of the company, and, if necessary, by calls to be made on the contributories, for all losses, costs, &c. except such losses, costs, &c. as shall have been improperly incurred by such official manager.

60. That no action, suit, or other proceeding in any of her Majesty's courts at Westminster or Dublin shall be proceeded with by the official manager, whether against a contributory of the company or any debtor or other stranger thereto, but with the leave of the master; and that no such action or other proceeding shall be proceeded with if the master shall, by writing, direct that same shall be stayed: provided that the want of such leave shall not constitute a defence to any such action or other proceeding.

61. That no claim which any contributory may have in respect of his share, or of the share of any deceased or former contributory of the capital or joint stock, or of any dividends, interest, &c. payable in respect of such share, shall be capable of being set off against any demand which the official manager may have against such contributory, upon an independent account, between such contributory and the company: provided that if a balance be due from any contributory on his account with the company as entered in the books thereof, and such contributory shall, upon an independent account, be a creditor of such company, the official manager shall set off such balance against the demand which such contributory shall be entitled to as such creditor.

62. That the official manager, with the leave of the master, may defend, by his official designation, or in the name of the original defendant, any action or suit brought against any individual contributory; but in such case any judgment or decree to be obtained by the plaintiff shall have the same effect, as if the same had been obtained against the original defendant.

63. That the master, as well before as after the order absolute, may summon before him any person, who shall be or shall be deemed to be capable of giving information concerning such company, or the estate, dealings, or affairs thereof, and may require such person to produce, and if a contributory to leave with the master or official manager, any books, papers, &c. in the custody, possession, or power of such person, necessary or expedient to be produced or left as aforesaid; and the master may examine such person on oath, by word of mouth, or upon interrogatories in writing concerning such company, &c.; and every person so summoned who shall not come before the master, or shall refuse to be sworn and examined, or shall refuse to produce such book, paper, deed, &c. shall be liable to be committed to the Queen's prison: provided that every such default or refusal shall be certified by the master, and thereupon such order shall be made by the court, upon motion of which notice shall be given to the person sought to be affected.

64. That every person summoned before the master shall be entitled to such costs as are allowed to witnesses; but that where any person who at the time of the order absolute was a contributory of such company shall be summoned, such person shall have such costs and charges as the master shall think fit; but in such cases the master may suspend the payment of such costs until such time as he shall think reasonable.

65. That if any person who at the date of the order absolute was a contributory of such company shall conceal any real or personal estate of such company, and shall not within thirty days after the order absolute discover such concealed estate to the master or official manager, such person shall forfeit the sum of £100, and double the value of the estate so concealed, to be recovered in action of debt by the official manager in any of her Majesty's courts for the use of the company; and the certificate of the master of such wilful concealment, shall be evidence in such action of debt of such concealment.

66. That after the appointment of the official manager, the master shall from time to time, by order to be made upon the application of the official manager or of any contributory require any contributory, trustee, receiver, banker, or agent to pay, or transfer forthwith, or within such time as the master shall direct, into the hands of the official manager, any sum or balance, books, &c. or effects which shall be in his hands, and to which the company is entitled, or which, in the case of a contributory, shall appear to the debit of his account as contributory in the books of the company, anything in the present practice of courts of equity to the contrary notwithstanding: provided that the person upon whom any such order shall be made may apply to the master to discharge or vary such order, or to enlarge the time hereby fixed.

67. That when any order shall be made under this act, by the master or by the court, for the payment of any monies, or for the delivery of any effects, books, or documents to the master or the official manager, and default shall be made by any person in obeying such order, the same may be enforced upon affidavit, by the official manager, of such default, and without any demand by the official manager.

68. That the conveyance or assignment by the official manager of all real estate, of whatever tenure, and chattels real, by this act vested in such official manager, shall be by deed of grant; and that every such deed of grant shall be approved by the master, and such approbation certified in the usual way; and being so approved and certified, shall be effectual to grant all the interest for the time being vested in the official manager, or which by such deed shall be expressed to be granted, of and in the real estate or chattels real intended to be granted, to the uses, intents, and purposes, or upon the trusts, or subject to the powers, provisions, agreements, and declarations, which may be contained in the same, according to the nature and tenure of the subject of the grant, without any confirmation by order of court or otherwise; so that the signature of the official manager to any deed so certified, wherein any money shall be expressed to be received by him, shall effectually discharge all persons by whom the same shall be expressed to be paid from suing to or being accountable for the application of the money therein acknowledged: provided that in the case of any copyhold or customaryhold hereditaments such deed shall be entered upon the court rolls of the manor of which the same are holden, and when so entered shall be effectual without any surrender or admittance of the grantees, subject nevertheless to the rents, and services due and of right accustomed for said lands.

69. That where any part of the assets of any company respecting which an order absolute shall have been made shall consist of any government stock, &c. or of the stock of any company in England, Scotland, or Ireland, not standing in the name of the company, the master, may by writing, direct such person as the master shall appoint in the place of the person in whose name such stock, shall be standing, (but subject to any directions, stop order, or other process which may affect the same,) to transfer the same into the name of "the official manager" of the company (described as aforesaid); and the governor and company of the bank of England, and all other companies and societies, are required to allow such transfer, and are indemnified for all things done pursuant to such direction.

70. That all monies which shall be collected, by the official manager, and which shall be derived by the sale of any of the assets of the company of which he shall be appointed official manager, shall be paid into the bank of Ireland, or any branch bank, to the credit of "the account of the official manager" of the particular company in respect of which such monies shall have been collected, and no money which shall be standing to such account shall be paid out by the bank except upon cheques signed by the official manager and countersigned by the master; provided that the official manager may retain in his hands for current purposes such a sum as the master shall direct.

71. That the official manager shall with all speed after his appointment, make out from the accounts and papers of the company a list of all debts and demands of the company, and shall make such observations on such debts as to the amount thereof, as he shall think proper to be made, to assist the master in forming a judgment when any debt shall be claimed to be proved before the master in pursuance of the advertisement herein-after mentioned; and when any debts shall be proved before the master as hereinafter mentioned, the same shall be entered in a new list by the official manager, so that the debts allowed by the master shall be distinguishable from such of them as shall be disallowed, or shall be allowed only as claims; and in case any debts which shall be disallowed, or allowed only as claims, shall be afterwards allowed by the master as having been proved, or shall be duly established by legal proceedings, such changes shall be made by the official manager in such list of debts as shall be required in order that such list may correctly represent the state of the affairs of the company in regard to the debts due from them; and in such list the official manager, in cases where it shall be necessary for the purposes of the winding up, shall enter the dates at which such debts were contracted, and shall enter all sums of money which shall have been paid on account of such debts; and such lists, and all changes therein, shall be entered by the official manager in a book to be kept by him; and such book shall, as occasion shall require, be inspected by the master.

72. That within ten days after the order absolute shall have been brought in before him, the master shall advertise in the London Gazette that he is winding up the company, and thereby require creditors to come in and to prove their debts.

73. That after the first appointment of an official manager, no creditor shall, except so far as the master shall permit, have power to commence any action against the official manager, or against the company, or any person who is sued as a contributory thereof, until after proof of his debt or demand before the master, and any judge of the court in which such action shall be pending, upon summons taken out before him for that purpose, may order that all further proceedings in such action shall be stayed, until such proof shall be made.

74. That the creditors of the company making proof of their respective debts before the master shall make proof by deposition or affidavit in the same manner as debts are now proved in bankruptcy: provided that the master may allow the proof of such debts to be made by the official manager, or by the creditors in such other form and in such other manner as he shall think fit.

75. That the master shall, upon proof of the debts due from the company, either allow or disallow, or allow as claims only, such debts respectively, according to the nature of the case, and of the proofs exhibited before him, and shall, by writing, declare such allowance and disallowance, or such allowance as claims only.

76. That the official manager shall make out a list of the members and other contributories, together with the addresses, and the number of shares or extent of interest of each, and such list shall distinguish the classes of contributories, and such additions shall be from time to time made therein, as that the same shall be a true list of such members and other contributories; and in case any of the contributories shall after the making of the order absolute assign or dispose of any share, right, title or interest in the company, the master, upon the application of the contributory making such assignment, or of the person to whom the same shall have been made, or of any contributory of the company, or of the official manager, may introduce into the list of the contributories the name of the person to whom such assignment shall have been made: provided that no such assignment shall release or exonerate the party making the same from any liability further than he would be released or exonerated if the affairs of the company were not wound up under this act.

77. That the list of contributories so made out by the official manager shall be settled by the master, and notice of his being about to settle the same shall be given in the Gazette, and otherwise as he shall direct; and such list and additions thereto, when settled by the master, shall be entered in a book which shall be inspected by the master, and certified under his hand to be entered therein.

78. That notice shall be given to every person included in or proposed to be excluded from the list of contributories, or in any addition thereto, before the same shall be so settled, notifying that such person is included in or excluded from the list, and if included then in what character, and for what number of shares, and of what amount, or for what other interest such person is so included; and that, if no cause shall be shown to the contrary, by a day to be fixed, and specified in such notice, the list shall not as to every person failing to show cause, be afterwards disputed, without leave of the court.

79. That so far as the master shall have settled such list or any addition thereto, every person included in such list, or in any addition thereto, or specially excluded, shall, unless cause be shown to the contrary, be bound and concluded by the list so settled, or by any exclusion therefrom, and shall not be entitled to contest the same without leave of the court.

80. That after the master shall have commenced to settle the list of contributories no person shall be entitled to appear before him as such unless his name shall be on the list: provided that any person specially excluded from such list, shall be at liberty to claim, before the master, that his name shall be inserted upon the list; and the master shall, upon consideration thereof, either admit or reject such claim, by writing under his hand.

81. That it shall be lawful for any person whose name shall stand upon the list of contributories to summon any person whose name shall not be upon such list, and who shall not have been specially excluded therefrom, to appear before the master, at a day specified, to show cause why his name should not be included in or specially excluded from the list; and upon the return of such summons, or at any future time to be fixed, he shall not consider the liability or right of the party so summoned to be inserted in such list, and shall by writing declare whether such party shall or shall not be included in or excluded from the list.

82. That the monies and assets of the company, or any part thereof, shall with all convenient speed be paid and applied by the official manager, under the direction of the master, to be from time to time given under his hand, in or towards the satisfaction of the debts of the company, by way of dividend or otherwise, as the master shall direct.

83. That at any time before the whole of the assets of such company shall have been collected, and if the assets remaining to be collected shall not be capable of being immediately realized, although such assets may not appear to be insufficient, and also after the assets of the company shall have been wholly exhausted, it shall be lawful for the master to make calls on the contributories, or on such individual contributories or classes of contributories as he may think proper, (but so far only as such contributories respectively shall be liable at law or in equity to pay the same,) as well for raising the amount necessary to pay the debts of such company, or the costs and expenses of winding up the same, as also for the settling the claims of contributories upon each other, or upon the company, whether such claims shall have arisen since or before a petition for dissolution and winding-up, or for winding-up, and the amount to be raised by such calls, and also the residue of the estate of the company after the payment of all debts and liabilities, shall be distributed by the official manager, under the directions of the master, in such manner as shall (as far as possible) satisfy all claims, and wind up and settle the affairs of the company.

84. That after the master shall have determined the amount to be raised by means of a call he shall apportion the same among the several contributories appearing upon the list, so far as then settled, or such of them as ought to contribute thereto, according to their respective liabilities, and that such apportionment may be made against such parties as he has already determined to be contributories, although it may then be under consideration whether other parties ought or ought not to be included in the list.

85. That previously to the making of any call the master shall, by any general order or any special order of the court direct, and in default of and subject to any such direction then by advertisement in two successive numbers of the London Gazette, as he shall think proper, give notice of a day, hour, and place at which he will make such call, and of the amount thereof; and all parties interested shall be entitled to attend at such day, hour, and place, and to offer objections thereto.

86. That unless cause shall be shown to the satisfaction of the master, at the time and place appointed, the master shall then make an order for such call, and for the payment to the official manager of the balance which shall be due from the respective contributories, after debiting them with the amount of such call, on a day and at a place to be therein fixed, such day not being earlier than three weeks from the date of the peremptory order.

87. That every such order shall be advertised once or often in the London Gazette, and a copy of such order shall be served on the respective contributories, and every contributory shall also be furnished with a statement of the balance of his account, after debiting the same with the amount chargeable against him in respect of such call: provided that the advertisement of such order shall not take place at a less period than ten days after the date thereof, or in case any appeal shall be made against such order, then such advertisement shall not take place until after such appeal shall have been disposed of.

88. That the official manager, with the approbation of the master, may from time to time enforce payment of, give time, or compound or require or take any security for any balance or claim as against the contributories of the company, and also to abandon such balance where the contributory against whom the same is claimed shall die, or be bankrupt, or take the benefit of any act for the relief of insolvent debtors, or be known to be insolvent, or in such cases as the master shall think fit; and it shall not be necessary to include in any call any contributory against whom any claim shall have been abandoned, but the amount of every subsequent call shall be apportioned among the other contributories: provided that nothing herein contained shall discharge the estate of any such contributory so left out from any claim which may exist on behalf of the company or any other contributory, but that the official manager may prove for the amount in the matter of such bankruptcy or insolvency (if any,) and receive dividends thereon, or proceed against such contributory, whenever it may appear expedient so to do; and any monies so recovered shall be part of the assets of the company, or otherwise as the master shall direct.

89. That in case any money shall be due from the estate of a deceased contributory whose executor or administrator shall not admit assets, the master may direct any action to be brought for compelling payment of what shall be so due, and for obtaining, if necessary, an administration of the estate of such deceased contributory, in or towards payment of his debts; and that any such action may be brought by the official manager by the style and designation aforesaid; and the production of the order or an office copy of the order for payment of any balance, shall be sufficient evidence of the debt in respect of which such action or suit shall be brought.

90. That as far as in the judgment of the master it shall be consistent with the interest of the company, the master shall cause the official manager to advertise in the London Gazette, or otherwise to give notice of all accounts and balance sheets, and particulars, if any, of proceedings in and about the liquidation which it shall be expedient to make known to the contributories, or to the creditors of the company.

91. That to facilitate the winding-up of any company, and to determine any questions of law or of fact that may arise between such company and any of the contributories or creditors, or between any two or more of the contributories, or between any contributory and any creditor, the master may direct such parties as he shall appoint, shall proceed to try, in such one of Her Majesty's courts of law at Westminster or Dublin, any issues of fact, and to direct that any actions shall be brought for the purpose of trying any mixed question of law and fact necessary, to be determined in order to the complete winding up of the affairs of such company; and the said master shall settle such issues, and he may give such directions as he shall think right with reference thereto, or to such actions: provided, that no issue or action shall be directed with reference to any questions between the company or any contributory thereof, and any creditor thereof, without the consent of such creditor.

92. That the master shall, subject to such appeal as herein provided, adjudicate and determine any matter in contest between contributories, or between the company and any individual contributories, which may be necessary to be determined in order to the complete winding up of the company.

93. That no orders, reports, or certificates of the master shall require confirmation except any such special report as herein mentioned.

94. That all orders, reports, certificates, and other acts and proceedings taken by the master in the prosecution of any matter, and all affidavits, interrogatories, examinations, and depositions, shall be filed in the master's office in one continuous file after the manner used in bankruptcy, and shall, together with all other documents relating to the same matter, be kept by him as part of the proceedings therein, and the same shall from time to time be produced in court as occasion shall require.

95. That all orders of the master shall be enforced in the same manner and by the same process as orders of the court made in any suit pending therein.

96. That the master, in addition to all powers vested in him by this act, shall, in proceeding under any reference to be made to him by any such order absolute, have all the powers and authorities, which he could in anywise have and exercise under the practice of the court in any matter referred to him by a decree or order made and pronounced in a suit.

97. That in case of the illness or absence of any master to whom any matter shall be referred, any other master, without any special direction or appointment of the court may act in the matter and exercise all the powers which such last-mentioned master might have had or exercised.

98. That it shall be lawful for any master during vacation, without special direction of the court, to act in any matter under this act in the place of the master to whom such matter shall stand referred, and to exercise all the powers which any master to whom the matter stood referred might have exercised; and when any matter shall have been referred to the master in attendance during any vacation, the master who shall commence such reference shall be considered as the master to whom such matter under this act shall stand referred.

99. That an appeal shall lie to the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls on motion, without the necessity of objections or exceptions from or against all orders, directions, reports, or other proceedings of or before the master relating to the winding-up of the company, including orders as to costs, entries or omissions of entries, or alleged entries or omissions of entries in the books of the official manager, or in any of the lists to be settled by the master as aforesaid, and any other matters affecting parties or any of the parties to the winding-up; and in all cases in which the question involved in any such appeal shall be one affecting the interests of the company, the notice of such appeal shall be served on the official manager, who shall appear on such motion as representing the company, unless the court or the master shall otherwise direct; and in all cases in which the question involved in such appeal shall be one affecting only individual contributories or others, the parties to be served with the notice of such motion shall be the parties respectively in whose favour the order appealed from was made, and who appeared thereon before the master; and upon the hearing of such appeal, and upon all applications to the court subsequent to the order absolute, the proceedings which have taken place before the master in the matter shall be produced in court, and no other evidence shall, without express leave of the court, be used in support of or against such appeal: provided that, except on special leave of the court, to be obtained on motion ex parte, or on notice, if the court shall so direct, no such appeal shall be brought after fourteen days after the order, direction, report, or other proceeding complained of shall be made or shall have taken place by or before the master, or after service of the same.

100. That the master shall have power, if he shall think fit, to make a special report concerning any matter arising about the winding-up, in order that the opinion of the court may be taken therein, and such report shall be brought before the court by such parties as the master shall direct, by motion praying that such report may be confirmed, discharged, or varied by the court; and on the hearing of such motion the same shall be confirmed, discharged, or varied, as to the court shall seem just, or such directions shall be given as shall appear to be necessary.

101. That every order made by the Master of the Rolls in England or Ireland, or any of the Vice Chancellors in England, may be reheard before the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain or Ireland, as the case may be, and such rehearing may be brought before the Lord Chancellor by way of motion.

102. That an appeal shall lie to the House of Lords from all orders to be made under this act.

103. That the general costs of winding-up the estate, and the costs of proving debts and of trying issues, and of all other matters in which creditors or any particular contributors or classes of contributors or alleged contributors of such company shall be interested, shall be at the discretion of the master, and shall be paid either out of the estate of such company, or shall be debited or credited to any individual contributors or class of contributors, or shall be subject to such set-off as the master shall direct.

104. That the costs of all proceedings which shall take place before the court shall be in the discretion of the court.

105. That all costs shall be ascertained by the master, or shall be taxed by such persons as he shall direct; and the masters of the court may and they are hereby required to tax all such costs as the master shall direct, and to make their certificate of such taxation in the usual manner.

106. That all costs ordered to be paid shall be recovered in the same manner and by the same process as costs to be paid by any party under any order or decree made in a suit pending in the court.

107. That the Lord Chancellor, with the advice and assistance of the Master of the Rolls or of the Vice Chancellor, may fix, regulate, and vary a table of fees to be paid and charged in respect of all proceedings, under this act.

108. That every summons, notice, order of which service is required, unless specially directed by this act, by the court, or by the master to be served otherwise, may be served by post to the last known address of the party or solicitor on whom the same is to be served, within such period as to admit of its being delivered within the period prescribed, if any, for notice to be given, and that although any such party may be out of the jurisdiction of the court; and in proving such service it shall be sufficient to prove that the document was properly directed, and that it was put into the Post Office, and not returned, the person to whom it is directed not being found, and it shall be deemed to have been served as of the day when it should have been delivered in due course of post.

109. That every advertisement required to be made in the London Gazette shall in the case of every company whose principal or only place of business shall be in Ireland, or the winding up of which shall proceed in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, be advertised in the Dublin Gazette instead of the London Gazette: provided that it shall be lawful for the Court of Chancery in Ireland to direct any such advertisement to be made in the London Gazette as well as in the Dublin Gazette, and vice versa.

TROUSERS.—The numerous testimonials received by JAMES O'DRISCOLL in approval of the elegance, ease, and peculiar style of his Trousers, and likewise the very flattering patronage bestowed on him by the higher classes of society, induces him to apprise his patrons, and those gentlemen who have not hitherto honored him with their orders, that he has secured the services of a few of the most experienced Paris workmen for the winter season. Sir,

"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has some advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture; it is susceptible of a very high polish, it does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

DUBLIN, JANUARY 13, 1849.

THE east and north, the west and south of Ireland, differ as much, perhaps, in property, poverty, and population, as any two peopled—and, (may we say?) civilized districts on the wide surface of the globe. The same poor-law extends over the whole island; the measures applicable to the circumstances of the east and north have been applied without hesitation—we had almost written without inquiry—to the west and south, with what success is told in the misery and ruin of the three last years; and, in the fearful apprehensions for the present one. The utmost care should be observed that the same mistake be not again committed, and that the distressed districts of Ireland be not legislated for on principles applicable only to the richer portions of the island.

From the appendix of the First Annual Report of the Poor Law Commissioners for 1848, we have the means of ascertaining the relative poverty of each union in Ireland, by the rate required for the support of its poor.

From this we learn, that in the provinces of Leinster and Ulster—excepting, in the former, the unions of Granard, Mountmellick, and Athlone; and, in the latter, the counties of Cavan and Donegal, all of which verge towards the west—the poor-rate required for the support of the poor did not, in any union, exceed 4s. in the £1, and in the great majority (viz, in 41 out of 63) did not exceed 2s. This moderate rate is owing to the number of resident proprietors, gentry and wealthy farmers; and, further, to the fact that the pauper population is not excessive. These resident gentry and farmers have given considerable employment, and, should a necessity arise, could give more. A system of taxation which would render each property liable to the support of its own poor, would be applicable in these provinces, and would probably be attended with considerable success.

On the other hand, in the provinces of Connaught and Munster (excluding the county of Waterford), out of 51 unions, 31 required a greater rate than 4s., 21 more than 5s., 8 more than 10s., and 1 more than 21s. in the £1 for the support of their poor. Here there is an excessive population, few resident proprietors, gentry or wealthy farmers, and no employment, or means of affording employment, at all proportionate to the vast number requiring it; and here, also, we find the absolute poverty of each district directly in proportion to the number of paupers to be supported—the cultivated surface of each union decreasing, directly as the numbers on the relief lists increase. It is clear that a system of taxation which would render each property liable to the support of its own poor, is utterly inapplicable under such circumstances as these.

It is said, in these circumstances the rate in aid will supply the deficient funds; but it appears to be not sufficiently considered, that the adoption of this principle at once destroys the separate responsibility of estates. Again, the few still solvent proprietors are embarked on the ocean of pauperism, struggling to swim amongst multitudes of sinking men—vari nantes in gurgite vasto.

It is not to be supposed, because we say that 4s., or 10s., or 21s. in the £1, on the valuation, was required for the support of the poor in these unions, in 1848, that these rates were actually levied, or could be—the correspondence lately published, between the Marquis of Sligo and Mr. Redington, on the state of the Westport Union, is conclusive to the contrary. From this correspondence it appears, that since the year 1846, this union (which is valued at £38,876 per annum) received, in the way of grants and loans from government, no less a sum than £133,000, whilst from its own resources it was able to contribute only £6,000. We say able to contribute, because (as the affairs of the union have been long since confided to the management of paid guardians, who are entirely under the control of the Commissioners, aided by an inspector, who, in testimony of his efficiency, has been lately promoted) it is to be concluded that they made the union contribute all it could to the support of its pauperism. Westport Union, however, is not singular in this respect. If the accounts of the neighbouring unions were investigated, it would be found that they received as much, if not more in proportion, in the way of grant and loan, and contributed as little; and hence (spreading these advances over three years, 1846, 1847, and 1848) it appears that these unions received more than 20s. in the £1, annually, on their valuations from governmental sources, to aid their local rates in the support of their poor.

It is not to be supposed, either, that these unions, in consequence of this enormous outlay, are now better able to support their own poor than they were three years ago: in fact, they are in a much worse condition—the paupers, who numbered about three-fourths of the whole population, having been employed on works studiously selected as being not reproductive, the lands remained untilld, and each succeeding harvest found the same, or rather an increasing destitute population, altogether unself-supporting. Hence the small amount of poor-rate which the vice-guardians have been able to collect in the Westport Union; and hence, at least, 20s. in the £1, on the valuation, must be advanced once more—from the consolidated fund, from a rate in aid, or from some other source—to enable the population to live till next harvest, and another 20s. in the £1 to enable them to live till the harvest after; and so on, ad infinitum, if, in the mean time, advantage be not taken of some spring to make a fertile land yield food.

Now, will any one acquainted with the circumstances of the western or south-western unions, seriously assert that proprietors or landholders in these districts could advance 20s. in the £1 on the valuation, or 10s. in the £1—which has been suggested as the limit to local taxation, and which, as we before observed, is not far from 20s. on the value—even if by advancing this 10s. or 20s. in the £1, they could have the population supported till harvest, and their lands cultivated? We say advance; for it is notorious that western or southern proprietors would look for credit in vain, and their labourers must be fed until next August or September, until when no return could be reaped from the land; and if proprietors could neither advance, nor pay this 10s. in the £1, how would the other parts of the country be benefitted by rendering their properties responsible, even to this limit, for the support of the poor? Or how would the poor be supported, if a rate in aid was not to be drawn on till after the locality had paid 10s., if this could not be collected? It is plain, in that event, the paupers must be supported by the rate in aid, and the local rate must remain due on the properties till better days arrive, if ever; or a better system be contrived; except the expedient of allowing men, women, and children to starve, be deliberately adopted.

If the proprietors and farmers in the west and south had the means of supporting their own poor till the produce of their labour enabled them to support themselves, as the proprietors and farmers in the north and east have, there might be some reason in advocating the principle that they should be compelled to do so; but it is as clear to us as noon day that they have not those means—their even if they adopted the suggestion of the Times newspaper, and, like the Roman Curtius, cast themselves headlong into the yawning chasm, it would still yawn on as hungrily as ever—a few pauperised proprietors (to use the cant of the day) would go but a short way to satisfy its cravings—the fee of these southern and western unions, sold at the prices they would fetch at present, would not be sufficient. Casting on property thus pauperised the support of its pauperism, till all its resources were exhausted (a result arrived at before 10s. in the £1 on the valuation were realized), would paralyze all exertion—another spring would rapidly away, and we should, for the fourth year, witness the insane effort to compel pauper landlords to give employment and money wages, without return for the one, or means to supply the other.

It is idle to expect that these pauperised districts will recover, even a feeble strength, speedily; if they recover at all it will be gradually; and they will require, from some source, aid, liberally but judiciously applied for a considerable period of time. Burdening them with excessive taxation, as 10s. in the £1, and chaining the paupers to the soil, would, in our opinion, not only retard their up-hill progress towards prosperity, but would hurry them in the opposite direction. The profitable employment of the pauper labour is their only hope, and this can only be obtained by inducing men with capital and industry to take land and settle in the country. A general rule, placing all Ireland on a level, with respect to taxation, would not only enable the landholders who are not yet ruined, to recover, but would greatly encourage speculation in land in the distressed districts; and when the transfer of small estates in fee are rendered simple and cheap, would, by gradually introducing a respectable class of farmers and gentry into the distressed districts, eventually raise them from bankruptcy and ruin to independence and wealth.

GENERAL ORDERS.

January 3, 1849.

The Right Honorable Maziere Brady, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honorable Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, Master of the Rolls, doth hereby order and direct, in manner following:

1. That no recognizance hereafter to be entered into by or for any tenant, receiver, sequestrator, guardian, or other person, who, according to the general practice or orders of the Court, or to any special order made in any cause or matter, may be bound to enter into a recognizance, shall be deemed to be completed within the meaning of such practice or orders, or special order, unless and until, in addition to the due enrolment thereof, the same shall be duly registered in the office of the registrar of judgments, in pursuance of and according to the provisions of the act of the seventh and eighth years of the reign of Her Majesty, intituled 'an act for the protection of purchasers against judgments, crown debts, lis pendens, and commissions of bankruptcy; and for providing an office for the registry of all judgments in Ireland; and for amending the laws in Ireland respecting bankrupts, and the limitation of actions'—and of an act passed in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her Majesty, intituled 'an act to facilitate the transfer of landed property in Ireland:' but the non-compliance with this order shall not affect the validity of such recognizance at law or in equity, otherwise than as the said acts, or either of them, may in such case affect the same, as against purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors.

2. That the masters shall not perfect any lease under a letting made to a tenant until, in addition to the certificate of the enrolment of his recognizance, a certificate of the said registrar of judgments, of the lodgment and entry of the memorandum or minute of such recognizance, required by the said first-mentioned act, to be left with him, endorsed on a duplicate of such memorandum or minute, in pursuance of the said act of the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her Majesty, shall be produced.

3. That the production of a like certificate of the registrar of judgments shall be requisite, with the certificate of the enrolment of the recognizance, to entitle a receiver, sequestrator, or guardian to enter the general order that the tenants do pay their rents and arrears to him.

4. That all receivers, sequestrators, and guardians already appointed, shall proceed without delay, and before the first day of February next ensuing, to have the several recognizances heretofore entered into by them, or on their behalf, duly registered, pursuant to the said acts, in the office of the said registrar of judgments, and do produce the like certificate of the said registrar as aforesaid in respect thereto to the master, on the passing of their next accounts respectively, who may therein allow the costs of such registry; and the master shall have power to disallow his poundage on such account to any receiver, sequestrator, or guardian not producing such certificate, dated on or before the said first day of February, unless some satisfactory reason shall be given to him for the delay; and the masters shall not pass any such account without production of the certificate; and in their certificate of the allowance of the account, shall state that the same was produced, and the date thereof.

5. That to the next statement of facts to be laid before the master by any receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, or to his next account, whichever shall be first lodged after the date hereof, there shall be annexed, by way of schedule, a specification of the several tenants by whom recognizances have been entered into, and the amount thereof respectively; and the master shall examine into the same, and shall be at liberty in all cases, when he shall think fit, to direct the receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, or his solicitor, to effect, within a time to be fixed by the master, the due registration under the said acts, of all or any of the said recognizances, which it may be proper to have so registered, and to allow the costs thereof in the account of such receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, and to suspend the passing of any account until such direction shall have been complied with.

6. That any party interested in any cause or matter, or the receiver, sequestrator, or guardian appointed therein, may register under the said acts the recognizance of any deceased or discharged receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, or of any party which shall not have been vacated; and the master may allow in his next account to any such receiver, sequestrator, or guardian, the costs of such registration, where he shall think it was proper that the same should have been effected; and the master also may allow and direct to be paid to the general solicitor for minors, out of any funds properly applicable thereto, the costs of any such registration made by him, in cases where it may be necessary that such registration should be so made.

7. That the fee of 16s. 8d. shall be allowed to the solicitors of the Court for attending to register any judgment, decree, order, crown bond, lis pendens, or recognizance under the said acts, and for all duties relating thereto, including the preparation and signing of the memorandum and minute to be lodged with the registrar, and a duplicate thereof; but the masters in allowing any costs, under the fifth foregoing order, for the registration of the recognizances of tenants, may allow a lesser sum for each, in their discretion, having regard to the numbers registered by the same solicitor in the same cause or matter.

8. That where a separate report shall be made by a master under a decree, containing a direction to appoint a receiver, as provided by the 153rd of the general orders of the 27th day of March, 1843, any objection to such separate report shall be taken by notice, and not by way of exception; and no cause shall be set down to be heard on such separate report, or on any objection thereto.

DUBLIN, JANUARY 20, 1849.

Our late number stated some of the evils connected with the administration of property, placed under the dominion of our Courts of Equity.

That estates under their control are deteriorated in condition and value is the experience of every resident in the country, and of every casual traveller who visits our shores. The latter not unfrequently finds himself in a district where poverty and neglect have laid a heavier than ordinary hand,—hovels along the wayside, fields uncultivated, irregularly and ruinously sub-divided, agriculture in a state of relapse, no controlling power directing the few remaining energies of the cottier tenantry, the old family mansion of the inheritor presenting a forlorn aspect of dilapidation and decay; oppressed with a sense of painful melancholy, and surprised, even in Ireland, with this scene of desolation, he asks to what proprietor this region belongs,—and he feels quite satisfied that such should be its appearance, when he is informed that “It is in Chancery.”

If a proprietor were a man of very limited income, in proportion to the extent of his estate—if he were devoid of intellect and energy—we might excuse his inability or his infirmity; but if he had complete control over his estate and its revenues, well endowed with intelligence, active himself, and with the power of compelling activity in others, and yet his estate presented the appearance we have described, leniency itself could find neither excuse nor pity for control so misdirected, for activity so unemployed, and for a management productive of such lamentable results.

Now, does not a Court of Equity resemble, in many striking features, the latter of these proprietors? It possesses great control, and if not complete, because it wrongly forbore to exercise its powers, and has built up a series of precedents, embarrassing to itself, and cumbersome to the properties placed under its care. Land and the Court of Chancery seem to have no natural affinity; they have never improved by contact with each other.

But let us not lay upon the management of such a Court more sins than it is justly chargeable with. The wretchedness of its uncared-for estates is not, in all instances, primarily attributable to it; from the embarrassment of the inheritors, they had been previously neglected, were rack-rented, and undergoing a rapid process of deterioration. But what we do blame the system pursued by the Court of Chancery for, is, that when it finds such estates bad, it makes them worse, and sometimes receives them prosperous and leaves them wretched.

An instance often illustrates a principle. We take one of the many which the annals of the Court of Chancery could furnish; the facts came before the Court the last year, and were verified by the affidavit of a Protestant clergyman. In the year 1835, a Receiver was appointed over a property of £514 a-year, paying a head-rent of £164; at the date of his appointment, the arrears on the property to the previous gale-day amounted to £2 14s. 1½d. The rental was higher than that subsequently settled by the Court; there was no hanging gale, and the rents, falling due in September and November, were paid in the following December; there was no pressure on the tenantry, and no pauperism on the estate. The very first account passed by the Receiver shewed an arrear of £322 10s. 1d.; this went on progressively accumulating, until in 1842 the arrear had reached the sum of £841 10s. 3d., the greater part of which appearing by the Receiver's affidavit to be irrecoverable, the sum of £832 5s. 3d. was wiped out by the Master in one stroke. It was to be hoped that henceforward each year would have brought a year's rent; but no; the next account showed an arrear of £269 14s. 8d., which went on increasing, till it reached in 1846 the sum of £678 12s. 6d., and in 1848, upwards of £900. The costs incurred for this excellent and efficient management amounted to the moderate sum of £309 6s. 9d., to which is to be added the poundage retained by the officer of the Court, for his meritorious services. Nor is this the worst. In Trinity Term, 1848, two applications were made to the Court; one by the head-landlord for permission to bring an ejectment, the head-rent having fallen into arrear; and a second by the Incumbent of the parish, whose tithe-rent charge, amounting to the small annual sum of £16 4s. 2d., was allowed to remain unpaid.

Nor had the inheritor the satisfaction of knowing, that whilst landlord, clergyman, and creditor remained unpaid, his tenantry were improved. For thirteen years his property was under the dominion of the Court; during that interval, he was deprived of all control over his tenantry, unable to assist them or improve their condition, and not a shilling was expended on the property for its permanent improvement. When, at length, he was restored to his proprietorship, he found his tenantry generally unable to pay rent, and many of them reduced to the necessity of seeking relief under the Poor-law. The condition in which this estate was restored to its owner, evidences strongly the defective management of the Court of Chancery—a management which acts with a peculiarly fearful effect on properties occupied by a numerous and small class of tenantry.

What is the peculiar vice of this system?

It deprives the proprietor of the power, of aiding his tenantry, of exercising any control in preventing sub-letting, the ingress of pauper tenants, the over-cropping and mismanagement of land—and it confers that power on nobody. While the control of the Court of Chancery continues, such power is virtually extinct; the Receiver, as we have observed in a former article, requires no qualification but to find sufficient securities; he is required to discharge no duties, save to collect rents. It is the worst species of absenteeism, thus managing estates through non-resident agents who have no discretion committed to them,—who cannot interfere to prevent the subdivision of a farm, to aid a tenant whom a little assistance would enable to become independent, or to exercise any of the thousand privileges of a landlord, except at an expense to the estate which might cost more than the advantage gained was worth, or after a delay which would render his interference useless.

Why should not the Court itself perform those peculiar duties, which it takes from the landlord, and transfers to nobody?—why should it devote its entire attention to the interests of a mortgagee or incumbrancers, to the exclusion of the proprietor and the tenantry? And this consideration acquires much more importance when it is recollected that in 1847 there were over 1000 estates, covering a fifteenth part of the whole rental,—and, in all likelihood more than a fifteenth part of the whole surface—of Ireland, under the dominion of our Courts of Equity; and whilst we now write, the number has increased and is increasing. The Chancellor's list for the present term contains 171 causes, nine-tenths of which relate to land. The business transacted in the Rolls Court is rapidly and progressively increasing; the fees received in the various offices connected with the Court of Chancery are swelled to nearly double their ordinary amount; the ordinary revenues hitherto derived from one, averaged £6000 per annum; last year it exceeded £11,000. Recent legislation also will still further extend the control of the Court of Chancery over land.

More attractive and dazzling subjects may present themselves to the attention of a legislator, but he could not serve his country more effectually than by devising a practical remedy for the evils we have attempted to describe. The calamities of Ireland do not spring from a single source, and they can be best combatted in detail. The proprietors of Ireland are told, that if they will exert themselves, prosperity is within their grasp; if they prefer idleness and inattention, they must inevitably sink. Should not the same reasoning be applied to the Court of Chancery? Is there anything in the property under its control, to exempt it from the common lot of Irish estates?

Let the Receivers under the Court of Chancery be more assimilated to agents on well-managed private estates, and if it be considered dangerous to give Receivers an independent discretion, at least let the instructions of the Court be conveyed with the rapidity of directions from landlords to their agents. The cumbrous and expensive machinery of statements of facts, affidavits, reports, &c., neither suit the circumstances nor exigencies of distressed estates. Surely a system can be devised which would accomplish these objects, and without any increase of expense to the country. The costs allowed to Receivers during the four years comprised in the return to which we have primarily alluded, averaged above £30,000 per annum. Add to this the 5 per cent poundage on near a million sterling, and there will be a total of nearly £80,000 a-year, shewing an expence of 8 per cent on the rental, a greater per centage than is required for the management and improvement of the most flourishing private estates.

This expense, however great, is not all that is lost under this system, large sums are annually permitted to lie unproductive in the hands of Receivers, which should, the moment they were received, be invested to the credit of the different causes, and be made to accumulate for the benefit of the parties interested. Receivers, in this respect, should be placed on a level with private agents. The country might be divided into districts, and all the properties under the courts in each district confided to a resident receiver. By a well-managed system, we feel satisfied half the present expense of managing estates would be saved, the business of the Court of Chancery would be materially lightened, and the properties under its care would be improved during their transition through it, and cease to be the speaking reproach they are now.

115. That upon production to the registrar of the Court of Chancery in Ireland of any order or of the office copy of any order of the Court of Chancery in England, or of the master of such Court, made in any matter arising under this act, and upon production to the clerk of the entries of the report office of the Court of Chancery in England of any order or of the office copy of any order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, or of the master of such Court, every such order shall be entered in the registrar's book of the Court of Chancery of Ireland or England (as the case may be) by the officer to whom the same or an office copy of the same shall be produced, and such entry shall be certified by the proper officer at the foot of such order or office copy; and every order so entered shall be of the same force and effect and shall be enforced in the same manner in all respects as if it had been made by the court or by the master of the court in the registrar's book or master's order book whereof it shall be so entered.

116. That on production at the office in Edinburgh kept for the registration of deeds, bonds, protests, and other writs registered in the books of council and session, of an office copy of any order of the court or of the master made in any proceeding under this act, and of an affidavit that application has been made to the person mentioned in such order for payment of the sum ordered to be paid by him, and that default has been made, then such order shall thereupon be registerable in like manner as a bond executed according to the law of Scotland with a clause of registration and decret shall be interposed to such order, upon which execution shall pass, in like manner as execution passes upon a decree interposed to such bond, and shall have the like effect upon and against the person named in such order as if he had executed such bond.

117. That where the only registered place of business of any company or the head office of any company which shall not have any registered place of business shall be situate in England, then the petition for the winding-up of such company shall be presented to the Court of Chancery in England, and where the only registered place of business or the head office of any company shall be situate in Ireland, then the petition for the winding-up of such company shall be presented to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and such respective courts shall thereupon exercise all jurisdiction, powers, and authorities given by this act: provided that where any company shall have a registered place of business or shall transact business both in England and Ireland a petition for the winding-up of such company may be presented either to the Court of Chancery in England or to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and thereupon, the said Court shall have and exercise in the matter all the authorities and provisions in this act contained in like manner as if the only registered place of business of such company had been situate within the jurisdiction of the same court.

118. That the court, in addition to all powers and authorities given by this act, shall exercise the like authorities, as would have been exercisable in a suit duly instituted according to the rules and practice of the court, and to which all proper persons were parties, for the winding-up of the affairs of the company in the matter of which the petition is presented; and the general practice of the Courts of Chancery in England and Ireland in suits pending in the same, shall apply to all proceedings under this act.

119. That it shall be in the discretion of the court, on application to stay proceedings on any report or order of the master.

120. That if any matter shall arise in winding-up of any company which shall appear to the master not provided for by this act, or by any rules or orders in force, the master, on the application of the official manager, or of any party to the winding-up, or at his discretion, may report the same to the court, who may make thereon such special order or such general order, as may be necessary under the circumstances.

DUBLIN, JANUARY 27, 1849.

Is the case of Lyster v. M'Namara, reported 10 Ir. Law Rep. 597, the question for the first time was raised—for the consideration of the Court of Common Pleas—whether in an ejectment for non-payment of rent, not only the tenants in possession, but all persons having a legal interest in the premises held under the lease, should be served. On this question the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer have for many years held opinions diametrically opposed, the Court of Queen's Bench considering it sufficient to serve the tenant in possession; the Court of Exchequer, on the other hand, requiring that all persons having a legal interest should be served with the ejectment. In the Common Pleas this question has produced a difference of opinion, the majority of the judges, however, deciding with the Court of Queen's Bench.

This contrariety of opinion leads us to a consideration of this important question, which involves not merely a point of practice, or matter of convenience, but a legal right and principle. It appears anomalous that a lease may be regularly evicted, according to the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench, and yet can be revived, as it were, in the Court of Exchequer, by any person possessing a legal interest—it matters not how minute—and who has not been served with a copy of the Queen's Bench ejectment, he is allowed to take advantage of a legal right recognized in the Court of Exchequer as still existing, and re-evicts, if we may use the expression, the landlord.

In the case under consideration, the party whose non-service formed the ground of objection, was the assignee of a mortgagee; the mortgage and assignment were both registered; the mortgagee had been served. A point was raised, whether the ejectment statutes did not create a special exemption in favour of mortgagees and their assigns. The court, however, gave no separate opinion on this branch of the case, and two judges out of three decided that the assignee need not be served.

It is not very easy to account for this difference of practice between the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer. The former professes strictly to follow that established in England, whilst the latter is, in our judgment, more in accordance with the spirit of the English system, as will appear from the following sketch of the nature of the action of ejectment, and the English mode of regulating it. This form of action, from the period of its use, was a proceeding for the recovery of possession, and we may here observe that there was no difference between ejectments on the title, and for non-payment of rent—at least as to the persons who should be served with the ejectment process—until the legislature interfered to regulate the proceedings of the latter. It was in fact a proceeding to obtain possession of land, the lease of which had been evicted by the re-entry of the landlord for condition broken, and the persons to be served in every case were those in possession only; all other interests under the lease being destroyed by the re-entry. (Gilb. Rents, 73, Co. Lit. 201, b.) But it being found, to use the language of Lord Holt, “that tenants in possession combined with lessors of the plaintiff, and ousted the landlord of his rent, and that the combination of the tenant in possession could not be prevented, unless the landlord was permitted to defend alone. The question arises, who is landlord?” We find from a very early date that the courts were in the habit of admitting persons claiming an interest—not inconsistent with that of the tenant—to defend either with him or alone. In 12 Mod. 211, (Anon) it is said that “if notice in ejectment be given to an under-tenant, and he doth not acquaint his landlord therewith, but suffers judgment to go against him, the court (upon motion) will not suffer execution to be taken out till the right be tried."

This case and others referred to in Fairclaim v. Shamtile, (3 Burr. 1290) shew that the anxious desire of the courts has been to assist those who claimed rights in the subject of the ejectment. But as the court could not be put in motion without an application on the part of the person seeking to join in the defence, and as the rights of those who remained in ignorance of the proceedings would be barred, the 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, was passed to prevent fraudulent recoveries of the possession by collusion with the tenant of the land, (Crocker v. Fothergill, 2 B. & Al. 652,) who, by the 12th section, is directed, as soon as the declaration in ejectment is delivered to him, to give notice of such delivery to his landlord, under pain of forfeiting three years improved, or rack-rent of the premises holden. And Lord Mansfield, in the case before cited, Fairclaim v. Shamtile, speaking of who should be considered a landlord within the meaning of this act, says, "it extends to landlords de jure, as well as to landlords de facto. A probable cause of claim is sufficient to entitle the landlord to be made defendant." And accordingly a devisee in trust, Loveland d. Norris v. Doncaster, (4 T. Rep. 122,) and a mortgagee, have been permitted to defend as landlord, as falling within the meaning of the act, Doe d. Telford v. Cooper, (8 T. R. 645) though perhaps not such as would be entitled to notice. That statute and these cases do not apply to this country, but both illustrate the design of the legislature, and desire of the courts, to aid persons whose interests would otherwise be defeated, without any opportunity of defence, in a court of law, and whose sole remedy would be through the instrumentality of a court of equity.*

This being the English practice, has it been adopted by our Court of Queen's Bench, and is the decision of the Common Pleas, in the case in question, consonant with it? Certainly not in spirit, and, we submit, not in practice either. The persons having intermediate interests in England, are not served with process in ejectment, not being in possession, but provision is made that they shall have notice—imperfect and indirect we admit—from the tenant, and may come into court, as we have shewn, either at common law, or under the provisions of the statute, (11 Geo. 2, c. 19,) whereas, according to our Queen's Bench practice, they may be in total ignorance of the attack upon their property, until it be, perhaps, too late to undo what has been done.

In ejectments on the title, the English practice

* It will of course be understood that these observations are only applicable to the ejectment for condition broken, in which it appears incontrovertible that all estates derived under the lease are divested (Co. Litt. 202, b. (1) 1 Rol. Ab. 474; 6 Co. 40, b. 41, a.) With respect to ejectments on the title—in contra-distinction to those for condition broken—the ejectment may be brought as often as the parties please. Now, persons whose claims rest on the evicted lease, if the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench be the correct one, have not this advantage, and this is an additional reason for the service of all persons legally interested in the lease.

is to serve only those in possession; in Ireland the practice of all the courts is to serve not only every person in possession, but every person claiming a legal or equitable estate on the premises sought to be evicted, who is known to the lessor of the plaintiff, and resides within the jurisdiction of the courts. Boardman v. Grier, (2 F. & S. 55, note.) Longfield Eject. 81, Ed. 1846. And for this reason it was deemed unnecessary to extend the provisions of the 11 Geo. 2 to this country. If this be so, there can be no reason why the same rule which has been adopted in cases of ejectment on the title, should not also be adopted in cases of non-payment of rent. The two cases being in their nature without distinction, are now looked upon as distinct actions, by reason of the ejectment statutes, which make no change in the persons who should be served.

The result of the English practice is this, that where it concludes all parties having interests in the lands, it provides for their having notice; where it does not so provide, it allows cross-ejectments to be brought. Now, our Court of Queen's Bench concludes persons, without giving them notice, who would be without redress, after the time had expired for redemption, if the Court of Exchequer adopted a similar practice, and did not allow cross-ejectments to be brought. Therefore we think that the practice of the Exchequer is more calculated to do justice, and more in accordance with that established in England.

It has also been always consistent. In Howard's Prac. Ex. of Pleas, p. 39, it is said, "that all persons who are in possession, or claim any title in the land, must be served; and in page 64, "where an ejectment is brought for non-payment of rent the practice is the same as where it is upon the title, except that there must be a notice that it is brought for non-payment, &c." And some of the older cases in the Queen's Bench appeared to have followed the same practice, until the cases of Nugent v. Earl of Bantry (2 H. & Br. 156), and Dunne v. Butler (Batty, 316, note), in which a different rule appears to have been first established, not without some hesitation on the part of the court, who expressly rested their decision on the basis of the English practice. If we have shewn that the practice was not, nor is, really what it has been assumed to be, we think the rule cessante ratione cessat lex should be applied to their mode of proceeding on this subject.

So far, we have treated this question without reference to the provisions of the Ejectment Statutes. The next consideration will, therefore, be—Have they made any change as to the persons to be served? And, for distinctness, we shall consider this branch, first, as to lessees and their assigns; and, secondly, as to mortgagees and their assigns; and it appears to us, from an attentive consideration of this code of laws, that the legislature have shewn an intention of interference with respect to the latter class alone.

The first statute (the 11th of Anne, c. 11, s. 2) enacts "that the summons in ejectment shall stand in place of the demand and re-entry at common law;" "that if it should appear that more than half a year's rent was due, and that there was no sufficient distress on the premises," then the lessor should recover as if he had demanded, &c., "and a re-entry made," &c.; "and in case the lessee or lessees, his or their assignee or assignees, or other person or persons, claiming or deriving under the said leases, shall permit or suffer judgment to be had, &c., and without filing any bill for relief in Equity within six months, that all such persons should be barred and foreclosed from relief at law or equity," &c. These words permit and suffer, &c., have been used as an argument to shew that the legislature intended the service of all persons claiming interests. This, it will be observed, is an Irish act of an Irish legislature, and was in advance of English legislation on this particular subject. It would appear, therefore, to be a more reasonable construction of those words to say, that the legislature found the practice of serving all persons having interests already in existence, and legislated accordingly. The analogous act (4 Geo. 2, c. 28, Eng.) contains the same words; and the 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, Eng., was then passed to remedy the mischiefs created thereby, which the Irish courts had already abolished, by their more equitable practice. The 4 Geo. 1 c. 5, s. 3, gives the right of ejectment when there is a year's rent due, though there be sufficient distress, but is otherwise similar to the 2nd section of the 11th of Ann.

With respect to mortgagees, the 3rd section of the Statute of Ann, and the 5th section of the 4 Geo. 1, c. 2, save unconditionally the rights of mortgagees not in possession. The previous sections of these acts being large enough to include them as persons claiming under the lease; and the 8 Geo. 1, sec. 4, extends the provisions of the former statutes, and enacts that registered mortgagees, and their assigns, if served with the ejectment, shall be bound, unless the premises be redeemed within nine months; and, if not registered within the fifth section, in that case, they were bound although not served. These provisions are, as we have said, in advance of the English legislation on the same subject, and are evidently framed with a view to the then uniform practice of the Irish courts; and in this view there appears to be no contradiction or difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to their meaning, which we would understand to be this—the saving in the statutes of 11 Ann and 4 Geo. 1, being too general, the statute of 8 Geo. 1 was passed, which did not enact that they should be served—that being already the practice of the courts—but the unlimited saving in the previous acts being found inconvenient, the object was to provide a registry of the mortgagees of the lease, that they might be more readily discovered, and then, if served, they have but nine months to redeem; if they are not served, but are registered, their rights are to be as before—that is, with an unlimited saving. And if they had not registered under the fifth section, in that case they were to be treated as if served, and should redeem within nine months, or be barred of all right to the lease. For this reason, we think the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas was, in this particular case, correct, the cases of registered mortgagees and their assigns, being especially excepted from what we conceive the general rule was, and should be, and whose rights were their first submitted to the opinion of a court of law.

We admit the force of the argument ab inconvenienti advanced by the advocates of the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench, that it is a hardship upon landlords that their rights may be defeated at the trial by a legal estate created by the tenant—perhaps with that very object—and of which the landlord could have had no means of discovery. This would but postpone his rights—on the other hand, substantial interests, and rights may not be postponed merely, but wholly defeated, if the party having the right happen not to have notice of the ejectment proceedings till the six months for redemption have expired. This may be said to be improbable, but it is not impossible; and if so, the mere postponement of rights is preferable to their destruction. Besides, the former evil might be easily remedied, by requiring such a registry of the assignments of interests under leases, as is required of mortgages by the 8 Geo. 1, and, if not registered, that they should be incapable of being set up at the trial in opposition to the landlord's rights.

We publish elsewhere the general orders prepared by the Chancellor and Master of the Rolls, under the Act to facilitate the sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland.

Taken in conjunction with the act itself, they present to the owner of an incumbered property greater facilities—having regard both to rapidity and cheapness—than any one accustomed to the slowness of Chancery proceedings could reasonably have anticipated. There are many points left untouched; and some of the orders will, so far as incumbrancers are concerned, probably render many costs untaxable, as between party and party, which yet must be incurred; and the effect will be from this and other causes, that this act will rarely, if ever, be resorted to by incumbrancers.

People in this world are very selfish, and dislike trouble—except they are paid for it—and the orders require so much inquiry beforehand, so much pains-taking accuracy, so much risk as to costs, that few creditors will choose a new course of proceeding, without any profit to themselves, for the philanthropic motive of saving expense to the estate to be sold. Under the bill system—and the privilege of filing them still exists—they had only to take care of themselves, and leave the other creditors to do likewise; under the new, they have not only to state their own case correctly, but that of every other purchaser on the estate, and to swear that there is not "any person having any estate or interest in the lands or lease mentioned in the petition, or any incumbrance or charge thereon, or whose consent is necessary to a sale thereof, other than the persons severally named as such in the petition." The petitioner is to do this without being allowed the expense of searches preparatory to filing the petition. The Master, for the purposes of title, may, after an order on the petition has been made, direct them, but the petitioner is in the awkward position of being obliged, without the means of knowledge, to make a perfect case by his petition, at the risk of having it dismissed with costs.

Again, when there is any question of fact to be elicited, or point of law to be raised, the machinery of the act gives no apt form of pleading. Nor does it offer temptation to those who require haste to begin and leisure to conduct the suit when the defendants are brought before the court.

Now, a bill may be filed in a day, without oath, or without the consent of any individual except the plaintiff, and, as the suit progresses, may be amended as occasion may require. We do not say that this system is better than the one proposed, but it is less troublesome and more independent for the incumbrancer, and therefore more likely to be adopted by him. We are disposed to think that the act, for some time at least—and never, except in simple cases, such as those which are now called friendly suits—will be little used by incumbrancers.

GENERAL ORDERS.

AN ACT TO FACILITATE THE SALE OF INCUMBERED ESTATES IN IRELAND.

Dated the 13th day of January, 1849.

The Right Honorable Maziere Brady, Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honorable Thomas Berry Cusack Smith, Master of the Rolls, doth hereby in pursuance of an act of parliament, entitled "An Act to facilitate the Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland," and in pursuance of all other powers in him vested, order and direct in manner following—

1. Every petition to be presented under the said act for the confirming and carrying into effect any contract for sale or for the sale of any land or lease, shall be verified by the affidavit of the petitioner or petitioners, or by that of some other person or persons, stating special reasons why the affidavit of the petitioner or petitioners, cannot be obtained in support of said petition.

2. That the deponent or deponents in every such affidavit shall depose to the truth of the several matters stated in the petition; and in addition thereto shall state that there is not to his, her, or their knowledge or belief any person having any estate or interest in the lands or lease, mentioned in the said petition, or any incumbrance or charge thereon, or whose consent is necessary to a sale thereof, other than the persons severally named as such in the petition.

3. That the fees to be paid upon proceedings under the said act, and all costs to be allowed thereon, shall be the same as may be now lawfully received by or allowed to the officers and solicitors of the Court on similar proceedings in any cause or matter pending in the Court; and all rules and orders of the Court for the taxation of costs shall apply to the fees and costs of such proceedings.

4. That the masters in ordinary of the Court, and the registrars, shall cause to be duly and regularly entered in proper books, to be kept in their respective offices, according to forms to be submitted to and approved of by the Lord Chancellor, the several particulars required to be stated in the return directed by the said act to be laid before parliament, so far as the documents and proceedings in their said respective offices will enable them so to do; and all such entries shall be made weekly at the least, so as to show at the end of each week the total amounts and quantities to that time of the several matters required to be set forth in such return.

5. Every petition shall contain an undertaking by the petitioner to submit to such order as the court may think proper to make, in the event of its appearing, on any enquiry to be directed under the petition, that such petitioner was not a person authorized by the statute to present such petition.

6. That the petition by the owner of land, under the second section of the said act, or by the owner of a lease, under the fourth section of the said act, who shall have contracted, subject to the approbation of the court, for the sale thereof, shall be entitled, and shall contain the statements as herein-after set forth, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each case may require.

In the matter of the Act to facilitate the Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland.
Ex-parte
[State the Name of the Petitioner.]

TO THE RIGHT HON.
THE LORD CHAN-CELLOR.

The humble Petition of

The petition shall state—

1st.—The date of the contract for the sale of the lands or lease, the parties thereto, and a concise abstract of the contents thereof.

2ndly.—In case the petition is by the owner of a lease under the fourth section of the act, the petition shall state the date of and the parties to the lease, and the short particulars thereof.

3rdly.—The petition shall state the estate or interest of the petitioner in the lands [or lease] so contracted to be sold, and the uses or limitations, and the trusts, if any, to which the said lands [or lease, as the case may be,] stand limited or settled; and shall also state the name of every person, who, to the knowledge or belief of the petitioner, has any estate or interest in the lands or lease in the said petition mentioned; and the dates of and parties to the several instruments referred to in the petition; and the party by whom the petition is prepared shall take special care that the abstract of the material parts of said instruments, stating the said uses or limitations, and trusts, shall be made with as much conciseness and brevity as is consistent with a clear statement of the same.

4thly.—In case the purchase money of the lands or lease contracted to be sold is less than the amount of the sum due on foot of the incumbrances and charges in the second schedule to the petition mentioned, the petition shall further state, the lands, if any, not contracted to be sold, which are subject to or affected by such incumbrances or charges and the estate or interest of the petitioner therein; and the name or names of the other owner or owners thereof, if any; and the gross rental thereof; and the several charges and incumbrances, if any, affecting said last-mentioned lands, and which shall not be specified in the second schedule to the said petition; and the net annual rental thereof.

5thly.—The petition shall further state, that in the first schedule thereunto annexed, is set forth a true and accurate rental of the lands [or leasehold interest] contracted or proposed to be sold; and such schedule shall be in the form herein-after set forth, and shall state the names of each sub-denomination, if any, the names of the tenants, the dates of and parties to the leases or other instruments under which the said tenants respectively hold, the tenures, the number of acres held by each tenant, the annual rents, the gale days, and the arrear due by each tenant to the last gale day.

6thly.—The petition shall further state, that in the second schedule thereunto annexed, is set forth a true and correct list of all the incumbrances and other charges affecting the lands [or lease] contracted or proposed to be sold; and the names of the several persons entitled thereto, or interested therein; together with the sums due on each incumbrance or charge, distinguishing principal from interest; and such schedule shall be in the form herein-after set forth, and shall distinguish such incumbrances or other charges which affect a derivative estate or interest, or less than the whole estate or interest in the lands or lease contracted to be sold, from such incumbrances or charges as affect the whole estate or interest in the lands or lease contracted or proposed to be sold; and shall also distinguish those incumbrances or charges which affect all the lands from such as may affect only a portion thereof; and the petition shall state that there is not, to the knowledge or belief of the petitioner, any incumbrance or charge affecting said lands [or lease, as the case may be,] save the incumbrances and charges in the said schedule set forth.

7thly.—The petition shall state the crown rents or quit rents (if any) subject to which such lands [or lease, as the case may be,] shall be contracted or proposed to be sold.

8thly.—The petition shall further state, that no incumbrancer is in possession of any part of the lands, and that no receiver has been appointed over the said lands [or lease, as the case may be,] or any part thereof; or if any incumbrancer is in possession, or has obtained an order for a receiver, add—save and except the party named, and that the consent in writing to the petition has been obtained, signed by such incumbrancer—and the petition should set forth the short particulars of the consent, and the date thereof.

9thly.—In case the lands are subject to any mortgage or mortgages, the petition shall state that they do not, nor do any of them contain any power of sale: or in case a power of sale is contained in any such mortgage, that the mortgagee has consented to the application; or if there has been a refusal or neglect to use diligence towards the exercise of such power of sale, the petition should state such refusal or neglect, as specified in the sixty-seventh section of the act.

10thly.—The petition shall further state, that no suit for foreclosure, redemption, or sale of the said lands [or lease, as the case may be,] or any part thereof, commenced before the first of July, 1848, is pending; or if any suit is pending, state the parties thereto, and when the bill was filed; and if such consent, as is stated in the sixty-seventh section of the act, has been obtained, state same.

11thly.—The prayer of the petition should be carefully framed in accordance with the tenth section of the act, according to the circumstances of the particular case; and it should further pray, that the contract for the sale should be carried into effect, in case the petitioner has previously to the petition entered into a contract in pursuance of the act, or if not, it should pray for a sale of the lands or lease, as the case may be, under the provisions of the act; and the petitioner should also pray for general relief.

The form of the petition, where the petitioner has not previously contracted for the sale of the land or lease, shall be the same, (omitting the statements numbered 1 and 4,) with such variations only as may be necessary in consequence of no previous contract having been entered into.

FIRST SCHEDULE TO THE PETITION.

Containing Rental of the Lands of _____ in the County of _____ (contracted to be Sold)—or where the Owner has not contracted previous to the Petition (which the Petitioner applies to the Court for the Sale of,) under the Provisions of the Act.

Sub-demonstration, if any.	Tenants' Names.	Date of and Particulars to the Leases, or other Instruments, if any, under which the Tenants respectively hold.	Tenure.	No. of Acres.	Annual Rent.	Gale Days.	The Arrear due by each Tenant to the last Gale Day.	Observations.

If any part of the Lands is in the actual possession or occupation of the Petitioner, state the number of Acres of which the Petitioner is so in the possession or occupation.

SECOND SCHEDULE TO WHICH THE FOREGOING PETITION REFERS.

Containing a List of all the Incumbrances and Charges affecting the Lands [or Leasehold Interest, as the case may be] contracted to be Sold; or [sought to be Sold, under the Order of the Court, as the case may be.]

1.	2.	3.	4.	5.	6.	7.	8.	9.	10.
Nature of Incumbrance; describing the particular nature of the same, according to the definition thereof in the First Section of the Act, i.e. whether it is a mortgage, or money secured by a Trust, or by Judgment, or by Decree, &c.	Charge, if any, not falling within the definition of an Incumbrance under the Act, e.g. a Jointure, or Rent Charge, or other Annual Charge not re-purchasable on payment of a gross sum of money.	Date and nature of the Instrument by which the Incumbrance or Charge was created, e.g. whether by Deed, Will, &c. and the date of the Judgment, Decree, Order, &c.	Parties to the said Instrument, Judgment, Decree, &c.	Parties in whom Incumbrance or charge now vested.	Whether the Incumbrance, Judgment, Decree, &c. affect the whole or a part, and if so, what part of the Lands contracted to be Sold, or sought to be Sold, under the Court.	Whether the Incumbrance, Judgment, Decree, &c. affect the whole Estate and interest in the Lands [or Leasehold Interest] contracted or sought to be sold under the order of the Court, or only a derivative Estate or Interest, or less than the whole Estate or interest in said Lands [or Leasehold interest], and if so, the nature and extent of such particular or derivative Estate or interest.	Principal sum due on Incumbrances falling under first column.	Interest due on Incumbrances falling under the first column, stating the rate of Interest payable on each respectively, and the day up to which the interest in each case is calculated.	Arrear, if any, due on the Charges specified in the second column and up to what day such Arrear in each case is calculated.

That the petition by the first incumbrancer on any land or lease, under the second or fourth sections of the said act, shall be entitled and contain the statements as herein-after set forth, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each case may require.

In the Matter of the Act to facilitate the Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland,
Ex-parte
[State the name of the Petitioner.]

TO THE RIGHT HON.
THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

The humble Petition of

The petition shall state—

1st.—The incumbrance vested in the petitioner, and how created, and if same was created by an instrument in writing, the date of and parties thereto; and the petition shall further state the material parts of such instrument, and no other parts thereof; such statement to be made, and the instrument abstracted, with as much conciseness and brevity as is consistent with clearness. If the incumbrance be a judgment, decree, or order of the Court, the petition shall state the date and parties thereto. If the petitioner was no party to such instrument, judgment, decree, or order, &c. the petition shall state concisely the instruments by which the right to such incumbrance is vested in the petitioner; the party preparing the petition taking special care that the title to the incumbrance shall be set forth in as concise a manner as is consistent with a clear deduction of such title. If the incumbrance is a judgment, and shall have been revived, the petition shall state the revival, and the parties to such judgment of revival.

2ndly.—If the petition is under the fourth section of the act, it shall state the date of, the parties to, and the short particulars of the lease sought by the petition to be sold under the order of the Court.

3rdly.—The petition shall state the uses or limitations, and the trusts, if any, to which the land or lease stands limited or settled, so far as the petitioner is acquainted with same, and in whom the estate or interest in the land or lease is vested; and the name of every person who, to the knowledge or belief of the petitioner, has any estate or interest in the lands or lease in the said petition mentioned; but the petitioner is not to be allowed any costs or expenses for searching the registry.

4thly.—The petition should further state, that in the schedule thereto annexed, the petitioner has set forth, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true and correct list of all the incumbrances and other charges affecting the lands [or lease, as the case may be.] proposed to be sold; and the names of the several persons entitled thereto, or interested therein; together with the sums due on each incumbrance or charge; and such schedule shall be in the form of the second schedule annexed to the petition by the owner of land; and which form the said incumbrancer shall fill up to the best of his knowledge and belief; and the petition shall state that there is not, to the knowledge or belief of the petitioner, any incumbrance or charge affecting said lands [or lease, as the case may be.] save the incumbrances and charges in the said schedule set forth. The petitioner, however is not to be allowed any costs for searches. This and the preceding provision, however, as to costs, are not to apply to any searches which may be directed by the master to whom the petition may be referred.

5thly.—The petition shall state the crown rents and quit rents, if any, subject to which such land [or lease, as the case may be.] shall be sought to be sold.

The petition shall further state the matters to be stated, eighthly, ninthly, and tenthly, in the petition, by the owner of land; and the prayer shall be framed under the tenth section of the act, according to the circumstances of the case; and the petition shall further pray, that the lands [or lease, as the case may be.] may be sold under the provisions of the act; and general relief.

A petition by an incumbrancer under the second or fourth sections of the act, [not being the first incumbrancer.] and being in possession of the title deeds and writings relating to the land [or lease, as the case may be.] shall be similar to a petition by a first incumbrancer, stating, in a schedule to his petition, a list of the deeds and writings in his possession.

7. That every petition as aforesaid shall be headed as follows, according to the circumstances of each case:—

1st. Petition by the owner of land who has contracted for the sale thereof, under the second section of the act; or 2ndly, petition by the owner of land, under the second section of the act, who has not contracted for the sale thereof; or 3rdly, petition by the first incumbrancer on land, under the second section of the act, for the sale thereof; or 4thly, petition by an incumbrancer on land, under the second section of the act, having possession of the title deeds and writings relating thereto, for the sale of such land; or 5thly, petition by the owner of a lease who has contracted for the sale thereof, under the fourth section of the act; or 6thly, petition by the owner of a lease, under the fourth section of the act, who has not contracted for the sale thereof; or 7thly, petition by the first incumbrancer on a lease, under the fourth section of the act, for the sale thereof; or 8thly, petition by an incumbrancer on a lease, under the fourth section of the act, having possession of the title deeds and writings relating thereto, for the sale of such lease.

8. It is further ordered, [in order to diminish the costs and expenses of proceedings in the master's office,] that where a petition shall be presented by the owner of land or of a lease, under the second or fourth sections of the said act, [whether the said owner shall or shall not have previously contracted for the sale thereof,] and where an order of reference shall be made upon said petition, referring it to the master [amongst other things] to take an account of the incumbrances and charges affecting the said land or lease, that the master shall, without any charge or discharge being filed, report the several sums stated to be due for principal and interest in the second schedule to the said petition; and also the arrear (if any) stated to be due upon the charges therein also mentioned, to the several parties respectively in whom the said incumbrances and charges shall be stated to be vested, together with any additional interest or arrear which may accrue before the signing of the report, unless so far as any error shall be established in said schedule, under the circumstances herein-after stated that is to say—

1st.—Any person in whom it is stated by said schedule that an incumbrance or charge is vested, shall be at liberty to file a charge for the purpose of correcting any error in said schedule, either in respect of the amount of principal or interest stated to be due on such incumbrance, or in respect of the arrear stated to be due on foot of such charge; or in case the said incumbrance or charge is not vested absolutely in the person stated in such schedule, or if any other person or persons is or are entitled to any estate, share, or interest therein, or if the said schedule shall be in any other material particular inaccurate in relation to said incumbrance or charge, a charge may be filed to correct such error; and if it shall appear to the master that it was necessary and proper to file such charge for the purpose of correcting an error in said schedule, he shall in his report correct such error accordingly, and shall be at liberty to allow a sum not exceeding five pounds to the said person for the costs of filing such charge; but if the said schedule was correct, and the charge unnecessarily filed, such person on whose behalf such charge shall be filed, shall pay to the petitioner such sum for costs, not exceeding five pounds, as the master shall direct; which sum shall be deducted from his demand, or paid to the petitioner as the master shall direct. provided always, that in case the said charge shall be contested, the master shall be at liberty to allow such additional sum beyond five pounds, in the cases aforesaid, as he may deem reasonable.

2nd. Any person in whom it is stated by the said schedule that an incumbrance or charge is vested, or any person whose name, or whose charge or incumbrance is not stated in such schedule, who shall file a charge on foot of any incumbrance or charge, save in the case hereinafter-mentioned, provided such charge so filed shall be allowed by the master; and any other person having any estate or interest in such land or lease, with the permission of the master, shall be at liberty [in case such person disputes the right of any party whose name is specified in the schedule, or the sum stated to be due to such party] to file in the master's office a traversing note, to the effect herein-after stated—and thereupon a copy of such traversing note shall be served by the party who shall have filed same upon the party in whom it is stated in such schedule that the said incumbrance or charge is vested; and in case the party upon whom such traversing note shall be served, shall not, within one month after such service, or such further time as the master shall allow, file a charge on foot of his said claim, the master shall disallow same, and shall allow such sum for costs, not exceeding five pounds, to the person filing such traversing note, as the said master shall think fit, such sum so allowed for costs to be added to his demand; and if the person served with such traversing note shall file a charge on foot of his claim, the party filing such traversing note (but no other person without the leave of the master) shall be at liberty to file a discharge thereto; and such proceedings shall or may be taken on foot of such charge and discharge, as are in such cases usual and if the charge so filed shall be disallowed by the master, the person filing such charge shall be liable to pay to the person by whom the said traversing note shall have been filed, his costs, properly and necessarily incurred in disputing such claim; which costs the taxing master shall tax and certify without any order of the court, upon a certificate signed by the master of the disallowance of such charge; and if the master shall allow the charge so filed, the person by whom such traversing note shall have been filed shall pay to the person whose charge shall be so allowed his costs, properly and necessarily incurred in establishing such claim; and which costs the taxing master shall tax and certify without any order of the court, upon a certificate signed by the master of the allowance of such charge: provided, always, that the master shall be at liberty to name any sum to be paid by either of the said parties ad and for the costs without taxation: and it is further ordered that if any party filing a charge under the said order of reference, shall claim any incumbrance or charge specified in said schedule, or any right, share, or interest therein, and shall dispute the right of the person in whom it is stated in said schedule that the said incumbrance or charge is vested, either in the whole or in part, it shall not be necessary in such case to file any traversing note—but the person in whom it is stated by the schedule that such incumbrance or charge is vested, shall receive notice of such charge, and he shall thereupon be at liberty to file a discharge to such charge—and the master shall decide the rights of the said claimants, and make up his report thereon accordingly, and shall make such order as to the payment of costs by the one claimant to the other as he shall think fit; and the taxing master shall tax said costs without any order of the court for that purpose, upon the certificate of the said master: provided always, that it shall and may be lawful for the master to name any sum to be paid by either of said parties as and for the costs without taxation—provided also, that it shall be lawful for the said master, if he shall so think fit, and if it shall appear that the schedule to the petition was erroneous in stating the name of the person in whom the incumbrance or charge was vested, to direct that a sum not exceeding five pounds shall be paid by the owner of the land or lease to whichever of the said claimants the master shall direct; such costs to be added to the demand against the said owner, or otherwise paid as the master shall direct—and credit shall be given for such sum out of costs awarded as between the claimants, if the master shall so direct: and it is further ordered, that the said traversing note shall be to the following effect, having regard to the circumstances of each case, that is to say—

In the matter of the act to facilitate the sale of incumbered estates in Ire. land,
Ex-parte
[Name the petitioner in matter.]

A B. a person whose name is included as an incumbrancer [or having a charge] on the land [or lease] in the schedule to the petition mentioned; or A. B. a person who has filed a charge under the order of reference in this matter, and whose charge has been allowed; or A. B. a person having an interest in said land [or lease,] with the permission of the master, [as the case may be,] disputes the claim of C. D. in the second schedule to the petition mentioned, either wholly or in part, [as the case may be,] and requires the said C. D. to file a charge and establish same.

9. It is further ordered, that if any person who shall be entitled to any charge, not being an incumbrancer, within the meaning of the said act, [including any such apportioned charge as in said act mentioned,] shall be willing under the provisions of the twenty-second section of the said act, to accept a gross sum in satisfaction of such charge, and shall file a charge under said order of reference for such purpose, and if the master shall include in his report such charge as an incumbrance under the provisions in such section, it shall be lawful for the master to allow such sum, not exceeding five pounds, for the costs of such charge, as the master shall think fit; provided, always, that in case said charge shall be contested, the master shall be at liberty to allow such additional sum beyond five pounds, as he may deem reasonable.

10. And it is further ordered, that if any incumbrancer, or person having a charge to whom an arrear on foot of such charge is due, shall claim priority over any other charge or incumbrance, prior in point of date, under the provisions of the act for the registry of deeds, or the act for the registration of judgments, or upon any other ground, such person shall be at liberty to file a charge for the purpose of claiming such priority, if such priority shall not appear in the second schedule to such petition; and shall in such case be entitled to such costs of proving such claim, not exceeding five pounds as the master shall direct: provided, always, that in case said charge shall be contested, the master shall be at liberty to allow such additional sum beyond the five pounds as he may deem reasonable; and provided also, that the costs of any discharge which may be filed to such charge by any other incumbrancer shall not be borne by the owner of the land or lease.

11. And it is further ordered, that where the owner of land, or of a lease shall present a petition under said act, and such owner shall be only tenant for life, or have some other limited interest therein, and where from the disability of the party entitled in remainder, or for any other cause, the master shall so think right, it shall be lawful for the master to direct a charge to be filed by any person, in whom it is stated by the second schedule to the petition, such charge or incumbrance is vested; and to require such proof as to the said incumbrance or charge as he may think right; and to allow such costs for such charge, and for proving same, as the master shall think reasonable, in case same shall be proved to his satisfaction.

12. And whereas, if the petition by the owner of land, or of a lease, under the second or fourth sections of the said act, be properly prepared, as herein-before directed, the expense of filing a charge thereunder, for the purpose of again stating the uses and limitations, or trusts, if any to which said land or lease is subject, or for the purpose of any of the other enquiries directed by the order of reference, will be unnecessary—it is further ordered, that no charge shall be filed for any such purposes, under said order of reference, unless the master shall otherwise direct; and if the master shall direct a charge to be filed, it shall be confined to such matters as the master shall direct;—and it is further ordered, that the master shall be at liberty, if he shall consider that the petition sufficiently sets forth and puts in issue the documents and other matters necessary to be proved under the order of reference, to proceed to make the enquiries directed by said order upon a summons, without any charge being filed; and if the master shall direct such charge to be filed, no costs thereof shall be allowed to the solicitor as against the petitioner, unless the master shall otherwise direct.

13. It is further ordered, that if proceedings shall be taken before the master upon such petition without a charge being filed; the petition shall be considered as a charge, for the purpose of entitling any person to file a discharge to such petition, who would have been entitled, according to the practice in the master's office, to file such discharge if a charge had been filed; and where said petition shall be proceeded on as a charge, all general orders of the Court shall be applicable to the proceedings on such petition as would be applicable to proceedings on a charge.

14. It is further ordered, that where a petition shall be presented by the owner of land, or of a lease, under the second or fourth sections of the said act, [whether the said owner shall or shall not have previously contracted for the sale thereof,] and an order of reference shall be made thereon, [the advertisement which the master shall cause to be published under the fourteenth section of the said act, in addition to the matters directed by the said section,] shall, instead of requiring all persons having incumbrances to come in and prove their demands, require all incumbrancers and persons having charges to proceed in the manner directed by the eighth general order herein-before set forth; and in case the master shall cause any notice to be served, under the 16th section of the said act, upon any person in whom it shall be stated, in the second schedule to the said petition, that an incumbrance or charge is vested, such person shall not be entitled to any costs of appearing before the master in pursuance of such notice, other than such costs as are provided for by these general orders, unless the court shall otherwise direct.

15. It is further ordered, that in every report to be made by the master under any order of reference under the said act, the master shall state, in a schedule to his said report, the number of meetings which have taken place under the said order of reference, and the dates of such meetings.

Sir,

"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has no advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture; it is susceptible of a very high polish, it does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY 3, 1849.

A considerable portion of the present article was prepared for last week's publication, but was obliged to be held over from want of space. It was our intention to have presented, in the same number, our view of the probable working of the Act for the Sale of Incumbered Estates, now that the General Orders have rendered it complete.

Believing that the professions would find those General Orders useful, we had directed them to be printed in extenso. Unfortunately, the compositor, after they had been corrected, when arranging the matter into pages, transposed some lines in page 93, which made the first two paragraphs of that page unintelligible, and, when discovered, there was no time to amend the mistake without delaying the publication of our last number, to the disappointment of our subscribers.

We regret that this error was committed, and, as the best amende in our power, will present them with a corrected copy, which shall be forwarded to each on Monday next.

We would ask them to remember, that at the outset of the career of every man, and every publication, there are difficulties to be overcome, and early struggles to be borne, and on this occasion to award to us a generous and kindly indulgence.

Some three months ago, we stated our opinion that very few sales would be made out of the Court of Chancery under the Incumbered Estates Act, and we still believe that opinion to have been correct. With reference to sales by order of the court, the act presents two very different aspects; when viewed with respect to incumbrancers, its operation is limited precisely to that class least likely to resort to it; and we adhere to our opinion, that so long as they have the power of selecting their equitable remedies, they will prefer the beaten track of filing bills, via trita, via tuta. We have already pointed out some of our reasons for arriving at this conclusion.

We understand the first five of the General Orders to apply to every petitioner, whether he be incumbrancer or owner. No. 1 directs every petition to be verified by affidavit. Now, a plaintiff in an Equity suit is not required to do this on filing his bill. Whether it would be a better principle that he should be obliged to make such an affidavit, is not the present question; but the non-necessity for doing so is certainly a privilege, and in favour of a plaintiff. He is allowed to ransack and lay naked the heart of the defendant—to file fishing bills—to put his case in every imaginable form of language that the ingenuity of his counsel may devise—to make positive assertions for the purpose of discovery, and even, if maliciously inclined, literally to torture his opponent by searching interrogatories, whilst he himself has the privilege of being a non-juror. Wherever, then, there is a question to be litigated, or likely to be in any way disputed, or in which the rights of an incumbrancer can be facilitated by the answer of a defendant, the incumbrancer will still adhere to the old practice.

General Order No. 2 requires that the deponent shall depose not only to the truth of the several matters in the petition, but to the absence of their being any person having any estate or interest, or any incumbrance or charge on the land or lease, other than the persons named in the petition; and in the third order, which applies solely to incumbrancers, the petitioner is directed to state the uses or limitations, and the trusts to which the land stands limited (in fact, the order must have directed this, the act having previously done so), and the name of any person who, to the knowledge or belief of the petitioner, has any estate or interest in the lands or lease in the petition mentioned, but the petitioner is not to be allowed any costs or expenses for searching the registry.

The fourth order applicable to incumbrancers, directs a statement that the schedule to the petition annexed contains a true and correct list of all incumbrances and charges, and the names of the several persons entitled thereto, and the sums due thereon, and that there is not, to the knowledge or belief of the petitioner, any incumbrance or charge, save those set forth in the schedule. The petitioner is, however, not to be allowed any costs for searches. This and the preceding provision, as to costs, are not to apply to any searches which may be directed by the Master to whom the petition may be referred. Now, an immensity of trouble is thus thrown on the petitioner, which he is not obliged to take if he file his bill. It is sufficient for him to state A. B. C. D. respectively claim some interest in the lands, but what that interest may be, is immaterial to him, provided they are pious to his claim; it is enough to bring them before the court, and then they may guard their own rights. An incumbrancer will not take trouble without a corresponding benefit. Neither can we see the precise object of requiring the petitioner to make such statements and affidavit. If he does not make searches, the information he gives the court must necessarily be imperfect; if he does, he may not be allowed for them; and he is in this unfair dilemma, either to give the court no information, being in no position to give it—and in that case may have his petition dismissed—or if he give perfect information, to run the risk of paying the cost, of so doing. His petition, if we understand the scope of the orders, will not be adopted by the Master, as in the case of an owner, and therefore is just as useless, when an order of reference has been made on it, as a bill after a decree to account. All the accounts, all the real work, in fact, must be done in the Master's office. How can an incumbrancer be expected to state, not only each incumbrance, but the sum due upon it, with any approximation as to accuracy, or for any useful purpose?

Again, General Order No. 3 regulates that the fees and costs shall be the same as those allowed on similar proceedings in any cause or matter pending in the court. Now, we do not profess to know the practice of the taxation of costs, or the scale of fees, but we believe that no fee is, as a general rule, allowed for the preparation of a petition by counsel. If this be so, the proceeding under this act being by petition, no fee will be allowed on taxation. The petitioner must, therefore, either dispense with the assistance of counsel in the preparation of a petition infinitely more troublesome than the preparation of a bill, or pay the fee out of his own pocket, or trust to the Taxing Master's discretion for its allowance. The fees to solicitors are much less liberal on filing petitions than on filing bills. We believe that most suitors would desire and require the advice of counsel, and so would the solicitor, who would otherwise have much responsibility cast upon him.

General Order No. 5 requires that every petition shall contain an undertaking by the petitioner to submit to such order as the court may think proper to make, in the event of its appearing, on any inquiry to be directed under the petition, that such petitioner was not a person authorized by the statute to present such petition.

We suspect few incumbrancers will like to give this undertaking, which implies, too, a doubt of the power of the court to make any order it thinks just. Suppose an incumbrancer, who believes himself the first, presents his petition, and suppose the owner of some charge, which has lain dormant so long as to have been believed extinct, suddenly to start from his fabled slumber into living existence, and be reported the first creditor; in such case would the petitioner be a person authorized to present his petition? Would he run the risk of having his undertaking put in force, when he runs no such risk by filing his bill.

We again suppose a case of disputed priority, and the petitioner to be postponed; in such case, would he not run a similar risk, and will he do so? Again, the hardy incumbrancers who venture on the untrodden ground have to remember that it has not yet been smoothed by judicial decision, and that the pioneers must clear the way at much trouble, cost, and expense, for their more fortunate successors.

In making these observations, we mean to find no fault with the Orders, we speak only of their effect. We believe them to have been prepared—an attentive perusal shews us that they have—with great care, but we think that they are obviously framed to facilitate owners rather than incumbrancers, and, considered with regard to the owner, we think both Act and Orders have conferred a most important boon on him; for the first time in the history of our jurisprudence there has been happily devised a judicial course of proceeding which will enable him, if honest, to sell his estate rapidly, cheaply, securely.

We have little doubt—exclusive of the expense of searches, which must vary according to the length and complication of the title—that an owner whose case is straightforwardly stated in his petition can free himself from incumbrances affecting his property by a sale of a portion of it at a very inconsiderable expense. The proceeding by him is as follows—his petition is to state concisely and clearly the nature of his title, and to have annexed in one schedule, the incumbrancers in their priority, and the sums due to each, and in the other a rental of the estate. This petition, carefully prepared, will carry the owner through the court. The Master is at liberty to adopt it, the creditor, if he sees his debt properly scheduled, cannot—except at the risk of paying his own costs—and indeed has no need to disturb or alter it. This was a very happy idea. The business in the Master's office is thus considerably reduced.

Where the owner is seized of an estate of inheritance in possession, the direction of a few advertisements, and the preparation of a report, the echo of the petition may comprise it all.

Where the owner petitioner is tenant for life, we do not observe any General Order regulating the practice as to remaindermen, minors, or persons under disability, and their rights become of extreme importance where the petition seeks to have a previous contract for sale carried into effect. And although in simple cases the adoption of the petition in the Master's office is an excellent innovation on the present practice; in more weighty ones, where priorities are disputed, the expense of taking out a voluminous document by each disputing creditor will be considerable. An extract from it would not, in many instances, be sufficient, or, at least, culling the precise points would require more time, perusal, and discretion, than a solicitor in extensive practice could afford unpaid to give.

The advantages to the owner are, however, great, the power of apportioning head rent, of having the land sold discharged of unredemable charges are in themselves very important benefits.

The act under our consideration affords abundant evidence of the difficulty of making the transfer of land easy, and, at the same time, of preserving future interests unimpaired. Real property cannot be made to pass from hand to hand like a bale of merchandize, and be also made the subject of family settlement. This act was compiled with great care. The bill was originally introduced into the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor of England in the session of 1847, and again in that of 1848; the measure underwent considerable discussion in the House of Commons, and was subjected to extensive alteration, and little improvement. Its avowed object was to give "currency to land," to facilitate its transfer, and yet, though it does effect important changes in the law, and confer a boon on incumbered proprietors, its operation will be, as respects them, but partial, and, as respects incumbrancers, almost a dead letter. In seeking to effect the object of simplifying titles, and superseding the present practice of judicial sales, it should not be overlooked that litigation will not be thereby diminished, it will perhaps be increased in a duplicate ratio, first taking its turn at the land, and then at the purchase money.

We would deprecate the idea that we write from a spirit of hostility to the principle of the act, on the contrary we are friendly to it, and lament its necessarily restricted operation. In dealing with a complicated system like ours, with a due and tender regard to existing interests, the wisest and most experienced legislator will find no ordinary difficulties around and about his path, difficulties the largest experience cannot at once devise means to overcome; the end, however, though not yet reached, is attainable, and unquestionably, so far as owners are concerned, this act is a move onwards.

Hitherto the Court of Chancery has been justly feared by proprietors whose estates have been so unfortunate as to require its interference; always appearing there as defendants they have generally sought to baffle and protract the plaintiff, in the vain hope of extricating themselves before a sale. But there was "no luck in leisure," their object, furthered by the tediousness which has hitherto appeared inseparably identified with Chancery proceedings, was gained to their ruin, and the wasting away of their estates, deteriorated and disimproved by an absentee Chancery Receiver, and by the accumulation of costs. The sale came at length, and left them—if their longevity survived it—in their "old age naked to their enemies." Let us hope that a new era has arisen, and that what has hitherto been an instrument of destruction to proprietors, may be converted into their effective and efficient ally.

Tax practice of lodging money in court has been lately considerably modified both in the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer. Formerly a defendant could at any period before trial, or without notice to the plaintiff, pay money into court, and the latter, on the very eve of trial, was often taken by surprise by the service of the rule. The payment was frequently made so late, that litigation was not checked, and the plaintiff had not the opportunity for reflection as to the withdrawal of his record. All his expenses had been incurred, and when he was so far committed—as occurred in the case of Greene v. Coughlan, where he only had notice on the very day of trial, at a country assize town—he would most likely proceed to the end. The Court of Queen's Bench, finding that the general rule of 1834 did not provide for such a case, last term made a rule that no order should be given for liberty to lodge money after plea, without the special order of the court, or a judge, upon application for that purpose. The motion must be on notice; at least the practice is so settled in the Court of Exchequer, who, on Thursday, refused an application for liberty to lodge money, where no notice had been served. The notice must also undertake to pay not only the costs of the action incurred at the time of the lodgment, but any further costs the Court may direct.

Whilst the Courts thus guard the plaintiff from being taken by surprise, they are equally stringent in depriving him of costs, if he persevere in his action after the lodgment, and be unsuccessful. In such case he will disentitle himself to the entire costs of the action, whether incurred previously to the payment of money into court, or afterwards.

This point was first decided in the Exchequer, and has been ruled in the same way in the Queen's Bench, in the case of Kershaw v. Lindsay, reported in a previous number, p. 31, the discussion of which occasioned the promulgation of the rule to which we have adverted.

The practice now stands on a very intelligible footing; the plaintiff is allowed full opportunity of considering whether he will proceed further, and if he does so advisedly, he must be prepared to lose the costs of the action, if he be unsuccessful, and to consider the cause of action on which the money has been paid, as if it had been struck out of the declaration altogether.

Hilary Term, 11th January, 1849.

At a council of the benchers of the honourable Society of King's Inns, this day holden at their Chamber, at the Four Courts, it was unanimously resolved—"That the call of Richard Dunn to the rank and degree of a barrister-at-law, in this society, be forthwith, and it is hereby vacated, and that he be, and he is hereby disbarred, and that his name be struck out of the books of this society."

Thursday last, Pierce Mahony, Esq., was sworn in Clerk of the Crown, in the room of Walter Bourne, Esq., deceased.

121. That notwithstanding anything herein contained, the Lord Chancellor may appoint any number of persons to act as official managers, and by any general order, or by any special order with reference to any particular company direct that the official managers of any company to be wound up under this act shall be chosen exclusively, or at the discretion of the master, from the list of persons to be so appointed as from a date to be fixed by any such order, and also to direct that such official managers shall be named or selected in rotation or otherwise, and also to determine whether any and what security shall be given by any official managers, and whether they shall exercise the authorities, giving to the official manager, and in all respects to fix and regulate the duties of the official managers; and in default of any such order, all the provisions in this act contained with reference to the official manager, duties, shall apply in all respects to any official manager to be appointed under this present clause.

122. That the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, with the advice and consent of the Master of the Rolls and any one of the Vice Chancellors for the time being, or with the advice and consent of any two of the Vice Chancellors, may make and prescribe such rules and orders concerning the form and mode of proceeding to be had for settling and enforcing the contribution to be paid by any contributory of any company, and the practice to be observed by the court in or relating to such proceeding, and the form and mode of proceeding to be had and taken before the master, or by reference from the court, in any matter relating to contribution, as shall seem necessary for the advancement of justice, and for adjusting the rights of the parties concerned, and getting in the assets, and for ascertaining and discharging the liabilities of such company, and requiring the creditors to claim their debts, and finally winding-up the affairs thereof with as little delay, expense, and uncertainty as possible, and afterwards to vary, discharge, or alter such rules or orders, by any other rules or orders, although such rules and orders, may repeal or vary the provisions as to procedure contained in this act or may prescribe others in lieu of the same; provided that such rules and orders shall be laid before both houses of parliament within one month from the making, if parliament be then sitting, or, if parliament be not then sitting, within one month from the commencement of the then next session of parliament.

123. That the district commissioners of the court of bankruptcy and the judges of the county courts shall be and they are hereby appointed to be masters extraordinary of the Court of Chancery for the purposes of this act; and the said Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls, on petition to be presented to him in any matter depending under this act, may direct the master to refer all of the said matter to any such district commissioners of the court of bankruptcy or judges of the county court, and by any order direct that such district commissioners or judges shall exercise in the matters referred to him all authorities by this act given to the master; and that the provisions in this act for the making and laying before parliament general rules and orders, shall in all respects apply to any rules or orders to be made for the regulating the authorities to be exercised by any such district commissioners and judges in any proceedings under this act.

124. That the provisions in this act contained for the making and laying before parliament general orders and rules for the purposes of this act by the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, shall in all respects apply to any rules and orders to be made by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, with the advice and assistance of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, for the purposes of this act in Ireland, such rules and orders to be laid before parliament in like manner as any rules and orders by the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain.

125. That any petition for winding-up under this act shall constitute a lis pendens within the terms of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, provided the same be registered in manner required by such act.

126. That the forms contained in the schedule to this act, with such variations therein as may be expedient in any particular case, may be used in any proceedings under this act, to which the same shall respectively be applicable, in whole or in part.

127. That this act shall not apply to Scotland, except so far as is by this act provided.

128. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

Schedule to which the foregoing act refers.

CAP. XLVI.

An Act for the removal of defects in the administration of criminal Justice. [14th August, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Accessories before the fact to any Felony may be punished in the same degree as the Principal.

2. Trial and conviction of Accessories after the fact.

3. As to additions of counts in Indictments for stealing and receiving stolen property.

4. Courts of Oyer and Terminer may cause Indictments to be amended.

5. Not to extend to Scotland.

6. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas the technical strictness of criminal proceedings might be further relaxed, without depriving the accused of any just means of defence: and whereas, it is expedient to make further provision for the more effectual prosecution of accessories before and after the fact to felony: and it is also expedient that any accessory before the fact to felony should be liable to be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects like the principal, as is now the case in treason, and in all misdemeanours: be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act, if any person shall become an accessory before the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law, or by virtue of any statute or statutes made or to be made, such person may be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects as if he were a principle felon.

2. 'And whereas, an accessory after the fact to felony can at present be tried only along with the principal felon, or after the principal felon has been convicted, which is 'sometimes productive of a failure of justice: be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act, if any person shall become an accessory after the fact to any felony, whether the same be a felony at common law or by virtue of any statute or statutes made or to be made, he may be indicted and convicted either as an accessory after the fact to the principal felony, together with the principal felon, or after the conviction of the principal felon, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, whether the principal felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted, and may thereupon be punished in like manner as any accessory after the fact to the same felony if convicted as an accessory may be punished; and the offence of such person may be inquired of, tried, determined and punished by any court which shall have jurisdiction to try the principal felon in the same manner as if the act by reason of which such person shall have become an accessory had been committed at the same place as the principal felony: provided always, that no person who shall be once duly tried for any such offence, whether as an accessory after the fact or as for a substantive felony, shall be liable to be again indicted or tried for the same offence.

3. 'And whereas, according to the present practice of courts of criminal jurisdiction, it is not permitted in an indictment for stealing property to add a count for receiving the same property knowing it to have been stolen, or in an indictment for receiving stolen property knowing it to have been stolen to add a count for stealing the same property, and justice is hereby often defeated: be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act, in every indictment for feloniously stealing property, it shall be lawful to add a count for feloniously receiving the same property, knowing it to have been stolen, and in any indictment for feloniously receiving property knowing it to have been stolen, it shall be lawful to add a count for feloniously stealing the same property; and where any such indictment shall have been found against any person, the prosecutor shall not be put to his election, but it shall be lawful for the jury who shall try the same to find a verdict of guilty, either of stealing the property or of receiving it, knowing it to have been stolen; and if such indictment shall have been found against two or more persons, it shall be lawful for the jury who shall try the same to find all or any of the said persons guilty either of stealing the property or of receiving it knowing it to have been stolen, or to find one or more of the said persons guilty of stealing the property, and the other or others of them guilty of receiving it knowing it to have been stolen.

4. 'And whereas a failure of justice frequently takes place in criminal trials, by reason of variances between writings produced in evidence, and the recital or setting forth thereof in the indictment or information, and the same cannot now be amended at the trial, except in cases of misdemeanour: be it enacted, that it shall and may be lawful for any court of Oyer and Terminer and general gaol delivery, if such court shall see fit to cause the indictment or information, when at variance or variances shall appear between any matter in writing or in print produced in evidence, and the recital or setting forth thereof in the indictment or information to be forthwith amended in such particular or particulars by some officer of the court, and after such amendment the trial shall proceed in the same manner in all respects, both with regard to the liability of witnesses to be indicted for perjury and otherwise, as if no such variance or variances had appeared.

5. Provided always, and be it enacted, that nothing in this act contained shall extend to Scotland.

6. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

CAP. XLVII.

An Act for the protection and relief of the destitute poor evicted from their dwellings in Ireland.

[14th August, 1846.]

- Sec. 1. After passing of Act, no Writ. &c. for taking possession of Land in Ireland shall be executed on the days or within the times herein mentioned.
2. Notice of execution of Writ to be given by Landowner, &c., to the Relieving Officer of the Electoral Division in which the same shall be situate.
3. Notice how to be given.
4. Persons becoming destitute by being dispossessed, may apply to Relieving Officer, who shall provide shelter, &c. Relief not to be given after one month, except under acts for relief of destitute poor.
5. Notice to be given where an occupier of a dwelling-house has not had notice in the Action, &c.
6. Penalty on executing Writ without notice.
7. The unroofing, &c., of dwellings for the purpose of expelling the occupier, a misdemeanour.
8. Provisions of Act to apply to Estates, and possessions of the Crown in Ireland, &c.
9. Interpretation of Act.
10. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas it is expedient to regulate the time of executing process for taking possession of land, and to provide for the better relief of the destitute poor evicted from their dwellings in Ireland: be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act, no writ of habere facias possessionem, decree, order, or other process for the delivering up or taking possession of land in Ireland, shall be executed on any Christmas day or Good Friday, nor on any day within two hours next before sunset, and before sunrise, or six o'clock in the morning, whichever shall be latest.

2. That not less than forty-eight hours before any such writ, decree, order, or process, as aforesaid, for delivering up or taking possession of land on which there shall be any inhabited dwelling-house, or building used as a dwelling-house, shall be executed in any county in Ireland, the landowner, or other person by whom such writ, decree, order, or other process as aforesaid, shall have been sued out or his agent shall give notice in writing to the relieving officer of the electoral division in which such land shall be situate, and such notice shall set forth the parish or barony, electoral division, and townland in which the land of which possession is so to be delivered up or taken is situate.

3. That every notice to be given to any relieving officer under this act shall be given by delivering the same to such relieving officer, or by leaving the same, directed to such relieving officer, at his dwelling-house or office, or by letter sent by the post directed to the relieving officer at such dwelling-house or office; and in case the same shall be so sent by the post, such notice shall be delivered directed, open and in duplicate, to the postmaster of any post office, and the postmaster shall compare the notice and the duplicate, and on being satisfied that they are alike, shall forward one of them to its address by post, and shall return the other to the party bringing the same, stamped with the stamp of the said post office; and such postmaster shall be entitled to have and receive from the person delivering such letter, the rate of postage, and the sum of sixpence; and such stamped duplicate shall be evidence of the notice having been given on the day on which such notice would in the ordinary course of post have been delivered at such dwelling-house or office of the relieving officer.

4. That it shall be lawful for persons who shall become destitute by reason of their being dispossessed of any dwelling-house, by or under such writ, decree, order, or other process, to apply for relief to the relieving officer of the electoral division in which the said land or house shall be situate; and such relieving officer shall, on the receipt of such application, take order for providing shelter for any such applicants, being destitute persons, by an order of admission into the workhouse of the union, if there be room, by conveying such destitute poor person thereto, or by affording such temporary relief in food, lodging, medicine, or medical attendance until the next ordinary meeting of the board of guardians, at which meeting he shall report the case and the nature and cost of the relief so afforded, in such form and manner as the poor law commissioners shall prescribe, and after such report shall give no further relief otherwise than by direction of the board of guardians, and the guardians shall furnish the relieving officer with funds for affording such relief, in the same manner and subject to the same rules and conditions as are or may be provided for all other relief granted by the relieving officer under and by virtue of 10 Vic. c. 31, s. 8; and it shall be lawful for such guardians, to provide every such destitute poor person with relief to the same extent as destitute poor persons permanently disabled from labour by reason of old age, infirmity, or bodily or mental defect, are by law entitled to relief in Ireland: provided, that it shall not be lawful for the guardians to relieve such destitute poor persons after the period of one calendar month from the date of such temporary relief being afforded, except in the manner by which such poor persons could be relieved under the acts now in force for the relief of the destitute poor in Ireland.

5. That in case there shall be upon any land of which possession is to be delivered up or taken under such writ, decree, order, or process as aforesaid, any inhabited dwelling-house, or building used as a dwelling-house, the occupier of which shall not have received notice for the determination of his tenancy, or shall not have been served with notice of the action, civil bill, or other proceeding in which such writ, decree, order, or process shall have been sued out, such occupier shall be served with notice in writing of the intention to execute such writ, decree, order, or process, not less than seven days before the same shall be executed, and such notice may be served by delivering the same to such occupier, or by leaving such notice at such dwelling-house, or other building, or affixing the same to some conspicuous part of such dwelling-house or other building: provided, that it shall not be necessary to name in such notice the occupier to or for whom such notice shall be delivered, left or affixed, or to serve any such notice on any occupier who shall have become such occupier less than twenty-one days before the execution of such writ, decree, order, or other process.

6. That in case the landlord or person by whom such writ, decree, order, or other process shall have been sued out shall neglect to serve the notice required by this act to be served on the relieving officer, he shall forfeit the sum of twenty pounds to the guardians of the union in which the land shall be situate; and such sum may be recovered by civil bill, and shall be applied in aid of the rates of the electoral division in which such land shall be situate, and in case such landlord shall be resident out of Ireland, may be recovered from him by action at law; and the service of process in such action on the attorney or agent by whom such writ, &c. may have been sued out shall be good service on such landlord or other person as aforesaid.

7. That whosoever, with intent to dispossess any person dwelling in a house, (whether such person shall be so dwelling under a continuing tenancy, or holding over, or otherwise,) shall pull down, demolish, or unroof, in whole or in part such dwelling-house or building used as a dwelling-house, whilst such person or any of his family shall be within the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

8. That all the provisions in this act contained shall apply and shall be construed to apply to all the estates of the Crown in Ireland, and to all proceedings taken on behalf of her Majesty, under the authority of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, or the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, or the Clerk of the Quit Rents, for recovering the possession of any part of such crown estates, whether by writ of intrusion, ejectment, or otherwise, in as full and ample a manner and subject to all the enactments herein contained in respect to all private parties recovering the possession of lands not being the property of the Crown.

9. That in the construction of this act, words importing the singular number shall extend to and include the plural, and words importing the masculine gender shall include females as well as males.

10. That this act may be amended or repealed in the present session of parliament.

Sir,

"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has some advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture. It is susceptible of a very high polish, it does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY 10, 1849.

Our columns of this week contain the names of several members of the bar who have been promoted to the dignity of Queen's counsel, and we believe a still further addition will be made to the Inner Bar in a few days.

Death has, within the last year, taken from that body one of its most distinguished members, one whose loss the public and the profession have equally had cause to mourn. By his death the Equity Bar of Ireland has been deprived of one of its brightest ornaments, and of one of the most conscientious advocates that ever lived. In the largest practice in this country, he was yet ever unprepared; his manner, generally quiet, was always impressive; respectful to the court, but firm in the discharge of his duty to his client. Good-natured and encouraging to his juniors—affable and accessible to his clients, he closed a long, laborious, and spotless career without, it is true, having ever attained office, but leaving to his successors a bright example of personal industry and political integrity.

Promotions have likewise taken place, and created vacancies amongst her Majesty's counsel, but the present and contemplated accession much more than counterbalances the number of the departed or promoted. We are far from using one disparaging word towards any one of those to whom patronage has been, or is about to be, extended; on the contrary, we congratulate them sincerely on their elevation, and we have no doubt that the most judicious selection has been made of those best adapted to the change of business which should follow their new position at the bar, having regard both to professional standing, ability, and the necessity for leaders, which unquestionably existed on two, and perhaps three of the Circuits—Leinster, Connaught, and North West.

What, we candidly confess, we dread as the result of this large inundation is this, lest Queen's counsel, becoming too numerous as advocates, should break through the line of demarcation which has existed from usage and time immemorial, and, whilst retaining the robe of silk, should undertake, or rather accept, that class of business which has always been considered as properly belonging to members of the Outer Bar.

The dignity and position of King's counsel, though not so ancient as that of Serjeant, is still of very respectable origin and antiquity.

The first King's counsel under the degree of Sergeant was Sir Francis Bacon, who was made so honoris causa, without either patent or fee; so, the first of the modern order, who are now the sworn servants of the Crown, with a standing salary, (which, however, amounts only, we believe, to about 40s. a-year, and is, of course, never demanded,) seems to have been Sir Francis North, afterwards Lord Keeper to Charles II.* These Counsel must not be employed against the Crown, without special license, but which is never refused, and costs about £9. A custom now prevails, of granting letters patent of precedence to such barristers as the Crown thinks proper to honour with that mark of distinction, whereby they are entitled to such rank and precedence as are assigned in their respective patents, sometimes next after the King's Attorney-General, but usually next after his Majesty's Counsel. These receive no salaries, and are therefore at liberty to be retained against the Crown. The late Mr. O'Connell, for example, having been for very many years a member of the Outer Bar, was at length called to the Inner, with a patent of precedence. In England, the precedence of counsel, to use the technical phrase, was anciently established thus :—

1. The King's Premier Serjeant,
2. The King's Ancient Serjeant,

* See his life by Roger North, p. 37.

3. The King's Advocate-general,
4. Attorney-General,
5. Solicitor-General,
6. King's Sergeants,
7. King's Counsel:

However, George IV., either at the request of the Attorney-General for the time being, or from his own ideas of propriety, altered the order of precedence so far as relates to the Attorney and Solicitor-General, as appears from the following directions to Lord Eldon in the year 1814:—"Whereas our Attorney and Solicitor-General now have place and audience in our courts next after the two ancientest of our Sergeants-at-law for the time being, and before our other Sergeants-at-law. We, considering the weighty and important affairs in which our Attorney and Solicitor-General are employed, do direct that the Attornies and Solicitors-General of us, our heirs and successors, shall have place and audience as well before the said two ancientest of our Sergeants-at-law, as also before every other person who is now one of our Sergeants-at-law, or shall hereafter be one of the Sergeants-at-law of us, our heirs and successors; and we do hereby will and require you not only to cause this our direction to be observed in our Court of Chancery, but also to signify to the judges of all our other Courts at Westminster, that it is our express pleasure that the same course be observed in all our said Courts."

The Attorney and Solicitor-General occupy the first and second places at the Irish Bar; next in precedence come the three Queen's Sergeants; our Court of Common Pleas, unlike that in England, being open to all barristers; next come the Queen's Counsel, taking precedence among themselves by seniority; the two first classes are always chosen from the latter, who are themselves called from amongst those whom success has distinguished from the crowd of the outer Bar—prohibited, except when licensed, from being employed against the Crown, and by seniority and position from undertaking junior business; the old etiquette of the profession, whilst it entitled them to larger fees, precluded them from taking the very lowest.

So far as Court business is concerned, the province of the two classes of lawyers is well defined, and the present members of the Bench have at all times shewn the utmost willingness to guard and preserve the privileges of the outer Bar; nor does this arise from their desire to favour one section of the profession more than another, but from public grounds, seeing that it is important that there should be a succession of able and intelligent men trained to the science and practice of the law, who may be ready to fill vacancies which death, promotion, or other causes may occasion in the inner Bar. A certain class of business has been exclusively assigned to stuff gownsmen, at once to test their qualifications and discipline them for those weightier matters of the law which they may hereafter be called on to conduct. In England, also, the Judges have exercised the utmost liberality, and allow costs to be taxed for a junior in every motion in which it is proper to engage a senior; for example, to take a bill pro confesso. In that country the rule is also firmly established, and it is the rule here likewise, though it has unfortunately in a few instances been departed from, that a Queen's Counsel should never settle pleadings which had not previously been prepared by junior counsel. If there be any doubt about this rule, there should be a Bar resolution either to rescind or confirm it. So long as it exists—as unquestionably it does—there should be no violation of it: it is an honourable compact which exists amongst the members of the profession. It originally was not established, but it sprang up from the paucity of the numbers of King's Counsel, who were so occupied as advocates, as to spurn the drudgery of drafting. It would be but just also to those high-minded members of the inner Bar, who—though knowing that the old usage has been violated by others—have scorned to infringe it themselves, that some fixed rule should be established; it would be just also to the profession, that it might hereafter be known that a silk gown would cease to be the honourable distinction of the comparatively few men who had gained the summits of the professional tree, or were prepared to relinquish in favour of their successors those emoluments which smoothed their own earlier difficulties, and that henceforward the position of one of her Majesty's counsel demanded no sacrifice of business, and required no qualification except that of professional standing.

According to the statute law of this country there is at present no act in force which renders it illegal for a clergyman directly to charge his benefice during his own incumbency. Without pausing to inquire whether it would not be salutary to place the law in this respect on the same footing as it is in England, we have been led, by a recent decision in the Court of Queen's Bench, to consider some of the peculiarities connected with the indirect jurisdiction of courts of law over ecclesiastical livings; for benefices—though protected from their direct operation—are by indirect means brought within their jurisdiction, and the priority among the different classes of incumbrancers, is dissimilar to that existing in all cases where charges are made available against freehold property in the hands of laymen.

The priority of judgment creditors ranks not from the lodging of the writ with the registrar of the bishop, and directing him to issue sequestration thereon, but from its publication. Lodging of the writ, without subsequent publication, is of no effect in charging the benefice. (Waite v. Bishop, 1 Cr. Mee. & R. 518). In the same case it is settled that the effect of the sequestration is not retrospective. The title of the sequestration creditor does not accrue till the sequestration is published. Therefore—as between judgment creditors—the law is on the same footing, with respect to a freehold interest, as it is in all other cases with respect to a chattel, the priority ranking, not from the priority of the judgment, but from the date of publication, which is thus made analogous to an execution lodged with the sheriff.

With regard to annuitants, it is settled in the case of Wiss v. Beresford, (5 I. E. R. p. 407,) that a party claiming under an annuity charged on a benefice, is entitled to priority over a judgment creditor of the incumbent, although the latter be prior in point of time, but not having obtained sequestration until after the date of the charge. Hence annuitants rank from the date of the deeds creating them, ousting judgment creditors, who may have obtained their judgments years before.

This is far from being a satisfactory state of the law, as it leaves it in the power of the incumbent to give an undue preference to a subsequent, over a prior creditor. The judgment and annuity, however, were prior to the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105.

But though thus the estates of incumbents, or their benefices, are rendered liable to the payment of their debts, yet the security they offer is far from being satisfactory. Not only is it liable to fail from the uncertainty of life, but it may be destroyed by the sequestration of the bishop, under 5th Geo. 4, c. 91, for non-residence, or other ecclesiastical misdemeanours—this sequestration affecting the very right of the incumbent to the benefice, and consequently the right of any creditors deriving under him. The decision to which we have adverted will illustrate this position. The facts of the case were:—a judgment creditor issued sequestration against the benefice of the Rev. H. Maxwell, and while his sequestrator was in possession of the rents, issues, and profits of this living—the amount of the judgment being yet not fully paid—the Bishop of Tuam issued his sequestration for non-residence. It was contended for the judgment creditor, that being in possession he could not be disturbed by a subsequent sequestration till his demand was paid—if the right of the incumbent to the benefice so long lasted—however, it was held by the court, that the bishop, from the moment of the publication of his sequestration, became entitled to the rents, issues, and profits of the benefice, the sequestration of the judgment creditor being from that moment entirely displaced by the superior character of the proceedings by the bishop.

The enactment conferring this authority on bishops, and on which this decision is grounded, is as follows:—(5 Geo. 4, c. 91, s. 25.)

"That in every case where it shall appear to any such bishop that any spiritual person does not sufficiently reside, it shall be lawful for such bishop to sequester the profits of such benefice of such spiritual person as aforesaid, until such order shall be complied with, or such sufficient reasons for non-residence stated and proved as aforesaid, and to direct, by any order to be made for that purpose under his hand, and filed as aforesaid, the application of such profits, after deducting the necessary expenses of serving the cure, either in the whole, or in such proportion as he shall think fit, in the first place, to the payment of such reasonable expenses as shall have been incurred in relation to such monition and sequestration, and, in the next place, towards the augmentation or improvement of any such benefice, or house of residence thereof, or any of the buildings or appurtenances thereof, or towards the improvement of any of the glebe or demesne lands thereof, or to order and direct the same, or any portion thereof, to be paid to the Trustees and Commissioners of First Fruits in Ireland, for the augmentation and maintenance of the poor clergy, to be applied for the purposes of such augmentation as such bishop shall in his discretion, under all circumstances, think fit and expedient. And it shall also be lawful for any such bishop, within six months after such order for sequestration, or within six months after any money shall have been actually levied for such sequestration, to remit to any such spiritual person any part or proportion of such sequestered profit, or cause the same, or any part thereof, that shall have been paid, or directed to be paid to the said trustees and commissioners, to be repaid to such spiritual person, which repayment the said trustees and commissioners are hereby authorized and required, upon an order under the hand of any such bishop, to make out of any money then in their hands, or, if no money shall be in their hands, then out of the next money that shall come to their hands, in any case, where by reason of the subsequent obedience of any such spiritual person to any such monition or order, or the stating and proving such sufficient reasons as aforesaid, such bishop shall think the same proper."

In the corresponding English enactment, 1 & 2 Vic. c. 106, there is, in addition to the provisions of the Irish act, one directing that in case a sequestrator was displaced by the issuing of a sequestration under the statute, that after providing for the service of the cure, &c., the profits of the benefice should be applied to the payment of the debt, on account of which the prior sequestration was issued, and then comes the permission to the bishop to remit any part or proportion of the sequestered profits to the incumbent, in case of his subsequent obedience, or rendering of sufficient reasons, taking care, in fact, that although the sequestration of the creditor was displaced, yet that he should suffer no injury which could be avoided, consistently with the proper service of the church.

The omission of this provision is a great defect in the Irish act, and places it very much in the power of bishops, if disposed to collude with incumbents, to defeat the rights of bona fide creditors. The bishop is the sole judge of insufficiency of residence, and so can at once displace the sequestration of any creditor. He is also the sole judge of the sufficiency of the subsequent obedience of the incumbent, or of his reasons for not obeying. And though—before he can remit any part or the whole of such sequestered profits to the incumbent—he must, if a bishop, transmit to the archbishop, and, if an archbishop, transmit to the Lord Lieutenant, a statement of the nature and special circumstances of each case, and the reason for the remission of any such penalty, yet this can, under no circumstances, be of any benefit to the creditor, nor is there any reason why, if the bishop or archbishop did not report the circumstances of the prior sequestration, that the creditor should do so, as in no instance could he get any part of the proceeds, their application being specially provided for in the act; so that the non-satisfaction of the prior sequestration would be no reason for not remitting to the incumbent the sequestered profits, if the bishop or archbishop thought proper so to do.

The 30th section of the Irish statute enacts—
"That if the benefice of any spiritual person shall continue for the space of two years under any sequestration, and under the provisions of this act, for disobedience of the bishop's monition, requiring such spiritual person to reside on his benefice, or shall, under the provisions of this act, incur three such sequestrations in the space of two years, the spiritual person not being relieved, with respect to such sequestrations, on appeal; the benefice, in relation to non-residence upon which such sequestration shall have been made, shall become ipso facto void, and the bishop of the diocese shall therefore give notice thereof to the patron or person entitled to present, who shall thereupon present or nominate some clerk thereto, other than the spiritual person whose benefice shall have so continued under such sequestration, or who shall have caused such sequestration as aforesaid, as if the same had been avoided by the natural death or resignation of such spiritual person."

And there is a similar section in the English act, so that even in England the extension of protection to the creditor by providing that the profits should go to the satisfaction of his sequestration, is but short-lived. However, short-lived as it is, it closes the door against collusion, such as we have pointed out as possible; and, as it renders the incumbent only ineligible to be presented to the same benefice again, it is no bar to his being presented to another, in which the same course might be pursued, and with the same success.

It was pressed in argument, in the case to which we have adverted, that until the forfeiture was incurred, or the two years had elapsed, the sequestration of the bishop should not deprive the creditor of those profits which his debtor might be entitled to, and that the title paramount of the bishop did not accrue until a forfeiture, and of this opinion was Mr. Justice Crampton, but the majority of the Court decided otherwise.

CAP. XLVIII.

An Act to facilitate the Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland. [14th August 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Construction of terms, &c. in this act. "Land," "Estate," "Lease," "Lease in perpetuity," "Incumbrance," "Incumbrancer," "Possession," "Owner," "Person" and "Owner," "Month," "Court," "Master," "Number." Gender. Sale and selling.
- Where land, &c. in Ireland is subject to incumbrance, owner may, subject to approbation of court, contract to sell the same.
 - Lands not deemed subject to incumbrance unless same affect a term of not less than 50 years unexpired, &c.
 - Where leases in perpetuity and long terms subject to incumbrance, owner may, subject to approbation of the court, sell same.
 - Leases in perpetuity, &c. to be subject to incumbrances only in certain cases.
 - Owner, &c. having contracted for sale may apply to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to confirm the sale or contract for sale.
 - Petition to set forth incumbrances, &c., and to be verified.
 - Lord Chancellor, &c. of Ireland may make rules, &c. for carrying this act into effect. Rules, &c. to be laid before parliament.
 - Lord Chancellor, &c. may alter rules from time to time.
 - Upon presentation of petition for sale, the court may refer the same to a master in Chancery, who shall inquire into the particulars, and report.
 - Rules, &c. in force with respect to certain proceedings for payment of incumbrances, &c. not inconsistent with this act, shall apply to proceedings under this act. Court to apportion costs as it may think fit. All persons becoming parties to be subject to the jurisdiction of the court, &c.

- Persons feeling aggrieved by report of the master not compelled to take exceptions to the same.
- In case of death, &c. parties interested may apply to the court to carry on proceedings.
- When, upon a petition, &c. a reference shall have been made to the master, he shall cause the same to be published by advertisements.
- Error in advertisement not to vitiate proceedings.
- Master, before proceeding, &c. shall cause notice to be given to all persons who shall appear to have interest in the subject of inquiry.
- Persons claiming an interest in any land, &c. may enter a caveat in the registrar's office, and shall be thereby entitled to notice.
- All persons claiming under reference to appear before the master, who shall in his report state by whom he has been attended, &c. Omission of the master to give notice not to vitiate proceedings.
- Persons who have been disallowed from attending before the master, or complaining of any certificate, &c., may apply to the court against such disallowance, &c.
- Directions of this act as to proceedings to have the force of orders of the court.
- When incumbrance shall be subject to limitations, the first person entitled, &c. is to make application.
- Where any person shall be entitled to any charge, &c. master may treat such charge as an incumbrance. As to the sale of any land, &c. a part only of which shall be desired to be sold.
- Report of the master and all other reports, &c. to be filed according to the rules of the court.
- Order for sale may include the whole or part of the incumbered land, &c.
- Court may order the whole of an estate to be sold, although master shall have approved of the sale of a part only.
- Previously to making order for sale, court may confirm the report nisi, and direct service of the same, &c.
- Assurance of land sold to be made in such form as the master shall direct, &c., and to vest the estate absolutely in the purchaser.
- Saving of rights of lessees, &c.
- Purchase money arising on any sale to be paid into the bank of Ireland.
- Owner of land subject to incumbrances may sell without order of the court, unless restrained by order after publication of notices.
- Incumbrancer after notice and neglect of owner may sell in like manner.
- Where several incumbrancers give notice, the first of such incumbrancers may sell.
- Notices to owners how to be given.
- Notices of proposed sales without order of the court.
- Where land or lease sold without order of court, notice to be served personally on persons having future estates.
- Saving of the rights of mortgagees.
- No land or lease sold without order of the court to be sold below selling value certified by surveyor appointed by Lord Lieutenant.
- Where required by caveat, notice to be given of the price at which land or lease sold without order of the court is contracted to be sold.
- Affidavit to be filed.
- Purchase money to be paid into court.
- Separate register of affidavits to be kept, and to be open to inspection.
- Defect in notices, &c. not to invalidate sale where purchase money paid into court.
- Operation of a conveyance upon a sale without order of the court.
- Rights prosecuted within five years not to be affected.

45. Sales without order commenced by owner or incumbrancer dying, &c. may be proceeded with by the person becoming entitled.
46. Purchase money on sale without order of the court to be applied according to the rights in the land.
47. Receipt of accountant general to be a sufficient discharge.
48. Where it shall appear that there is more than one incumbrance, court may direct proceedings to be instituted to ascertain priority of the same.
49. Application of surplus of purchase money.
50. Money paid into court may be invested in the funds.
51. Usher's poundage.
52. Appointment of new trustees.
53. Where any annual charge, not being an incumbrance under this act, shall affect any land to be sold, the person entitled to such charge may release the same, &c.
54. Parties to whom the surplus of purchase money is paid out of court liable to repay the money to parties proving a better title to the estate sold. Court may require security for such repayment.
55. Sale without order of the court not made bona fide for discharge of incumbrances to be treated as a breach of trust.
56. No payment towards discharge of incumbrance, not being payment in full, shall affect right of incumbrancer for balance.
57. Where incumbrancer shall be satisfied by payment out of any sale, &c., and other persons or lands are liable, court may order proceeding to be instituted on such terms as it may think fit. &c.
58. No payment in respect of any incumbrance to impair any right of any persons out of whose estate the same shall be made.
59. Where an estate shall be ordered to be sold court may empower the master to include in his report other interests in the same estate.
60. If land sold shall be subject to a lease, &c., comprising other land, master may apportion the rent, &c.
61. No person entitled to incumbrance shall be bound to accept payment without six months notice, &c.
62. Where incumbrance included in the order for sale shall not be payable or not ascertained, court may order a sum to be carried to the credit of same, &c.
63. Pending proceedings court may appoint a receiver, who shall be subject to jurisdiction of the court.
64. Court may appoint guardians of infants to act for them for the purposes of this act.
65. Court may appoint persons to act on behalf of lunatics, &c.
66. As to payment of costs.
67. No petition for sale without consent where an incumbrancer is in possession, or during pending suits. Power to stay pending suits. No suits to be commenced pending proceedings under this act, without leave of the court.
68. Proofs of debts, &c. in a discontinued suit may be used in a reference upon a petition.
69. Consent where necessary may by leave of the court be given subsequently.
70. Power to second or subsequent incumbrancer to redeem the prior incumbrances.
71. No petition for sale by assignees of bankrupts or insolvents, without consent of major part of creditors.
72. Release of a portion of lands not to affect the validity of a judgment as regards the residue of such lands.
73. Annual returns to be laid before parliament.
74. Short title.
75. Act to extend to Ireland only, &c.

Whereas it is expedient to grant facilities for the sale of estates in Ireland charged with incumbrances, be it enacted that in this act the word "Land" shall extend to manors, advowsons, rectories, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, and hereditaments, whether subject to any fee farm or other perpetual rent, with or without condition of re-entry, or otherwise, and whether corporeal or incorporeal, and the word "Estate" shall extend to an estate in equity as well as at law, and to any covenant or contract for or right of renewal; and the word "Lease" shall include an agreement for a lease, and the estate or interest created or to be created by such lease or agreement, and the expression "Lease in perpetuity" shall mean any lease or grant for one or more life or lives, with or without a term of years, or for years determinable on one or more life or lives, or for years absolute, with a covenant or agreement in any of such cases, whether in the same or in any other instrument, for the perpetual renewal of such lease or grant, whether such lease shall be derived out of the inheritance or by way of underlease out of any lease or other estate; and the word "Incumbrance" shall mean any legal or equitable mortgage in fee, or for any less estate, and also any money secured by a trust, or by judgment, decree, or order of any superior court of law or equity duly registered, and also any legacy, portion, lien, or other charge whereby a gross sum of money is secured to be paid on an event or at a time certain, and also any annual charge which by the instrument creating the same, or by any other instrument, is made re-purchaseable on payment of a gross sum of money; and the word "Incumbrancer" shall mean any person entitled to such incumbrance, or entitled to require payment thereof; and the word "Possession" shall include the receipt of the rents and profits; and the word "Owner," as applied to land, shall include any person entitled in possession in fee simple or in tail, or quasi in tail, and any person entitled in possession for a life or lives, or for a term of years determinable on the dropping of any life or lives, or for a term of years of which not less than ninety-nine years are unexpired, not being a lessee at a rent, and also any person entitled in possession as tenant by the curtesy, and any person entitled in possession to the equity of redemption or the property subject to the incumbrance, or to a trust for payment of the incumbrance, whether in fee or for any lessor estate, and any feeoffees or trustees for charitable or other purposes, entitled in possession; and the word "Owner," as applied to a lease in perpetuity or other lease, shall include any person entitled in possession to the land comprised in such lease for the whole estate created or agreed to be created by such lease, or for any derivative estate (created by settlement, or testamentary or other disposition thereof), quasi in tail, or for life or lives, or for years determinable on the dropping of a life or lives, or for years of which not less than fifty years are unexpired, not being an underlease at a rent derived out of such lease, and any person entitled in possession to the equity of redemption or the property subject to the incumbrance, or to a trust for payment of the incumbrance, in any such lease in perpetuity or other lease absolutely, or for any such derivative estate; and the word "Person," and the word "Owner" shall extend to a body politic or corporate as well as to an individual; and the word "Month" shall mean calendar month; and the word "Court" shall mean the High Court of Chancery in Ireland; and the word "Master" shall mean the master for the time being having the conduct of the reference; and every word importing the singular number only, shall extend to several persons or things, and every word importing the plural number shall apply to one person or thing; and every word importing the masculine gender only, shall extend to a female; and words importing sale shall include the carrying into execution any contract for a sale under this act; and where any act is directed to be done by or with respect to any person, or any consent to be given by any person, such act or consent may be done or given by the guardian of such person being an infant, or by the committee of the estate of such person being an idiot or lunatic, or by the husband of such person being a married woman (except that a married woman entitled to any land, estate, or incumbrance for her separate use for life, or for any greater estate, with or without power of anticipation, shall for the purposes of this act be considered as a feme sole); and this act shall operate as well with respect to any estate or incumbrance created before the passing of this act as with respect to any estate or incumbrance to be hereafter created.

2. That where land in Ireland shall be subject to any incumbrance the owner of such land may contract (subject to the approbation of the court) for the sale thereof, freed from all incumbrances, and such sale, if approved by the court, shall be carried into effect under this act; and such owner or person being the first incumbrancer on such land, or any person being an incumbrancer on such land in possession of the title deeds relating thereto, without having so contracted, may apply to the court for the sale of such land under this act.

3. That for the purposes of this act the land shall not be deemed subject to an incumbrance unless the same shall affect a term of fifty years unexpired, or a greater estate in such land, nor unless such incumbrance shall have been created by the owner of an estate of inheritance, but an incumbrance charged under a power created by the owner of an estate of inheritance shall be deemed to have been created by such owner.

4. That where any lease in perpetuity, or any lease of land for a term whereof not less than sixty years shall be unexpired at the time of such application as herein-after mentioned, shall be incumbered, the owner of such lease in perpetuity or other lease as aforesaid, may contract, subject to the approbation of the court, for the sale thereof, freed from all incumbrances, and such sale, if approved by the court, shall be carried into effect under this act; and any such owner of a lease in perpetuity or other lease, and also any person being the first incumbrancer on any such lease in perpetuity or other lease, or any person being an incumbrancer on such lease in perpetuity or other lease as aforesaid, and being in possession of the title deeds relating thereto, without having so contracted, may apply to the court for the sale of such lease in perpetuity or other lease under this act.

5. That such lease in perpetuity or other lease, shall not be deemed subject to an incumbrance where the same shall affect a derivative estate or interest only, or less than the whole estate created or agreed to be created by such lease in perpetuity or other lease, unless such incumbrance shall have been created by the owner of or person entitled to the whole estate created or agreed to be created by such lease in perpetuity or other lease as aforesaid, but any incumbrance charged under a power created by the owner of, or person entitled to such whole estate as aforesaid, shall be deemed to have been created by such owner or person so entitled.

6. That every owner having contracted for sale, and every owner, or first or other incumbrancer being desirous to sell, may apply by petition to the Lord Chancellor, for carrying into effect such contract for sale, or for the sale of such land or lease; and every such petition, and every subsequent petition, and other proceeding arising out of the same, shall be entitled "In the matter of the act to facilitate the sale of incumbered estates in Ireland," ex parte the person presenting such petition.

7. That every petition for the carrying into effect such contract for sale, or for the sale of such land or lease in perpetuity or other lease, shall set forth the estate or interest of the petitioner in such land or lease in perpetuity or other lease, and the uses or limitations, and the trusts to which the land or lease stands limited or settled, and the incumbrances and other charges affecting the same, including the crown rents and quit rents, subject to which such land or lease is contracted to be sold, and such petition shall be verified as the court shall direct.

8. That the Lord Chancellor, with the advice of the Master of the Rolls, from time to time may make any rules or orders for the better carrying this act into effect, and for the conduct of the proceedings under this act, and that the same may be done with the least cost, and as may be consistent with a due observance of the provisions hereof, and also for fixing the fees to be paid upon any proceedings, and the cost thereof, so that such fees and costs shall never exceed such as are lawfully received on similar matters: provided, that such rules and orders shall be laid before both houses of parliament within one month from the making thereof, if parliament be then sitting, or, if parliament be not then sitting, within one month from the commencement of the then next session of parliament; and any rule and order so made, shall, from the making thereof, for all purposes be deemed and taken to be a general rule and order of the court.

9. Provided, and be it enacted, that the Lord Chancellor, with the advice aforesaid, in like manner as aforesaid, may make rules or orders rescinding or altering former rules or orders.

10. That upon the presentation of such petition, the court, either by an ex parte order, or on notice to such parties as ought to have notice, may refer it to one of the masters to inquire as to the estate or interest of the petitioner in such land or lease, and as to the uses or limitations and trusts to which such land or lease stands limited or settled, and as to the incumbrances affecting the same (including such as are claimed by the parties who come in under the said order as all others, as shall appear from the title deed or on search or otherwise, and including also debts and incumbrances due to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors), and as to the persons entitled under such uses or limitations and trusts, and the persons in whom such incumbrances shall be vested, and as to the order and priority of such incumbrances, and the amount due thereon respectively, distinguishing principal monies from interest, and in case of a mortgagee or other creditor in possession taking all just accounts, and with or without rests, as shall be just, and as to the value of the land or lease which shall have been contracted to be sold, and also, whether any such incumbrances shall affect any land or estate other than the land or lease contracted to be sold, and whether such other land or estate shall be liable in priority, or in equal degree, or in posteriority, and as to the title to the land or lease contracted to be sold, and to the incumbrances, and as to the expediency of sale, and if a part only, of any incumbered land or lease shall have been contracted to be sold, whether such part be proper to be sold, and to make such inquiries relating to or affecting such land or lease, and the incumbrances and charges thereon, as the court shall think requisite, and to report upon the same; and the master shall have authority to direct searches to be made for judgments, and searches of the registry, and in all other places, and inquiries as to the identity of any person or property; and in such report the master may state any circumstances specially as the court shall direct, or as he shall see fit; and the master shall be at liberty to make a separate report as to any of the matters referred to him; and for any of the purposes of this act the said court shall have power to compel the production before the master, of all deeds and other writings relating to any property in question: provided that no incumbrancer, or other person being in possession of any title deeds of, or relating to any property (and shewing right to hold the same as a security for a debt or charge), or lien shall be compelled to produce the same, unless it shall have been ascertained by the report of the master that the money to be produced by the sale of the property, and applicable to the payment of such debt, will be sufficient to pay the same; but such incumbrancer or other person shall, on the order of the court, furnish copies or abstracts of such deeds; and in every case in which such incumbrancer, having such right, shall be required to produce such deeds or writings, or to furnish such copies or abstracts, the costs and charges of such production, or such copies or abstracts, shall be paid by the party requiring the same, or otherwise, as the court shall direct; and all orders for the production and for the furnishing of copies and abstracts of any such deeds, may be made on persons residing out of the jurisdiction of the court; and all notices to be given under this act, may be given and served out of the jurisdiction of the court; and the powers, provisions, and directions of an act passed in the 41 G. 3 c. 90, shall extend to all orders to be made under this act.

11. That all the laws, rules orders powers, and practice in force, with respect to proceedings in the court in a suit for foreclosure or redemption of a mortgage, or for sale of estates for payment of incumbrances or debts, shall apply to the proceedings under this act; and all such proceedings, by way or in the nature of further directions and otherwise, in case of a sale under this act, may be had and taken as in case of a decree for sale; and in every proceeding under this act, the court shall (except in the case herein-before mentioned and provided for) have full discretion as to the giving or withholding costs and expenses, and as to the persons by whom, and the funds out of which the same shall in the first instance, or ultimately be paid, repaid, and borne, and shall and may apportion the same amongst such parties, and in respect of interest or principal, and in respect of rents, or income and corpus, as it shall see fit; and that under every reference to the master under this act, he shall proceed in like manner, and with the like powers and authorities in all respects, and all orders and proceedings of, and before the master shall be enforceable in like manner, as in case of a reference under such decree as aforesaid; and all persons parties to any proceedings under this act, by contracting for the purchase of any land or lease, or by making any application to the court, or by submitting to the jurisdiction of the court, or by attending before the master in the course of such proceedings, or by otherwise concurring in any such proceedings, and the representatives of such persons, and all persons claiming under them, by their act, or by act of law subsequent to their becoming subject, as next herein-after mentioned, shall for the purposes of this act, be subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and to all orders of the court and of the master, in the course of any such proceedings, in like manner, and as fully as parties to a cause pending in the court are subject to the jurisdiction of the court in such cause.

12. That it shall not be necessary for any person thinking himself aggrieved by any report of the master to take exceptions; but it shall be incumbent on all persons parties to proceedings, or coming in before the master, to carry in objections in the usual manner, to the draft of the report; and any such person omitting so to object, shall not afterwards be heard against the report, without special leave of the court; and every proceeding before the court shall be carried on by petition or motion, in a summary way, or as the court may order; and proceedings under this act shall not abate, nor be suspended by any death, transmission or change of interest, except so far as it shall be necessary for the carrying on of any such proceedings, that any person not before the court shall have notice of, or be required to attend such proceedings.

13. That in case of death, or transmission, or change of interest, and wherever, after the presentation of a petition for confirming and carrying into effect a contract for sale, or for a sale, the direction of the court shall be requisite for carrying on the proceedings, or for effecting the objects thereof, it shall be lawful for any person interested in such proceedings, to apply to the court for an order for any such purpose, and the court may thereupon make such order as it shall see fit.

14. That when, upon a petition for confirming and carrying into effect a contract for sale, or applying for a sale, any reference shall have been made to the master, he shall cause an advertisement to be published, at least once in two successive weeks, in the Dublin Gazette, and in such daily, or other journals or newspapers in Ireland or England, or both, as the master shall think fit, stating the name or title of the petitioner; and in case the petitioner shall not be the owner, the name or title of the owner, and the denomination or short description of the land or lease contracted to be sold, and the county wherein the same shall be situate, and any other matters the master may think fit; and fixing a day whereon the master will enter upon the consideration of the matter referred to him, and requiring all persons having incumbrances to come in and prove them.

15. That no error or imperfection in any such advertisement shall vitiate the proceedings under such reference, unless the court, upon application or otherwise, shall determine that it ought to do so.

16. That the master, before proceeding upon any of the inquiries directed by such reference, and also from time to time under such reference, or under any further reference in the same matter, as, and when it shall seem to him fitting, shall cause notice to be given in such form as he shall think proper, to all persons who shall appear to him to have any interest in the subjects of such inquiries, and whose attendance shall appear proper, that he is about to proceed or that he is proceeding in the matter of such reference; and all notices under this act may be served out of the jurisdiction of the court, and the court may direct substituted service thereof in any case; and in case any incumbrancer or party interested, having been served with any such notice, neglect to appear in the master's office, or to file a charge, the court, on the application of any party, may make an order on motion of course, that such incumbrancer shall be bound by the proceedings as if he had been a party thereto, or such other order as the court shall think fit, and thereupon it shall be lawful to proceed notwithstanding the absence of such party; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the master, that any person to whom notice ought to be given, cannot be found, or cannot be served with notice, the master may state in his report the name of such person, and the circumstances under which notice was not or could not be given to him: provided that after such order, it shall be lawful for the master, at any time in his discretion, to admit, and for the court, on such terms as it shall think proper, to order him to admit, any party against whom such order shall have been made, to attend and proceed before him as if no such order had been made: provided, that the parties against whom such order shall have been made, shall not thereby be excluded from sharing in the proceeds of such sale, under the direction of the court, or from any other benefits of this act, consistent with effect of such order, or with such discretions as the court may make.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY 17, 1849.

In discussing the question as to the policy of rendering each estate responsible for the support of the pauperism existing upon it, there are two conflicting interests to be considered—the interest of the owners and the interest of the occupiers. There is also the effect of the system on the country generally. In every statement we have seen on this subject, the interest of the proprietors has been too exclusively considered. As to them, a large class would, no doubt, be decidedly benefited—owners who have resources at command, whose properties are unencumbered and not over-peopled.

There is another, and a still larger class who would be ruined—men who have no resources—whose properties are incumbered, and whose estates are over-peopled.

The first class of owners would feel but lightly the onus of employing or supporting the poor on their estates—their estates would be benefited by the employment given, and their people fed.

The estates of the second class of owners are generally unequal, at present, to support their population, and even the few which can yet do so, if burthened with individualized responsibility, will rapidly deteriorate. No farmer would cultivate land, the profits being absorbed in poor-rate; thus on these estates no employment would be afforded—they would go out of cultivation, and the population starve.

A rigid adherence to making each estate responsible for the support of its own poor, would soon get rid of the "Irish difficulty;" as the population of the distressed districts would rapidly be reduced to what each estate could support; and the expense of supporting an unprofitable population being removed, the estates themselves might be expected to improve. However, we do not anticipate that it will be deliberately contemplated, when legislating on this question, to improve Ireland by consigning a third of her inhabitants to starvation.

If the legislature will not permit this result to ensue, provision against it must be made, either by grants from the imperial treasury, or by a rate in aid.

The result of grants from the treasury would be, to benefit the estates which could support themselves, by freeing them from contributing, through a rate in aid, towards the support of their poorer neighbours on the distressed estates. If the grant only supplied what the estate could not, the population of a distressed estate would be kept alive, but the estate not benefited.

A rate in aid would lead to a tax over the whole surface of the country, and which—if a very moderate limit were not fixed as the maximum of taxation—would, by throwing the distressed districts out of cultivation, have a tendency to increase. This tax would, at the very first, be not very different from a general tax, irrespective of localities.

The consequence to the country generally, of individualising responsibility would necessarily be a law of settlement of the strictest possible character. As to the effect of such a law on the prosperity of a country, it is useless to theorize; it has existed in England for centuries, and every writer of eminence bears testimony to the evils it has wrought upon the prosperity and morals of the poor.

Sir William Blackstone (vol. I, p. 361)—no mean authority—in the eighteenth century, after stating that the object of the statute of 43 Eliz. c. 2, was, first, to relieve the impotent poor, and them only; secondly, to find employment for such as are able to work, observes, "the only defect was confining the management of the poor to small parochial districts, which were frequently incapable of furnishing proper work, or providing an able director. However, the laborious poor were then at liberty to seek employment wherever it was to be had, none being obliged to reside in their places of settlement but such as were unable or unwilling to work." And a little farther on—"After the Restoration, a very different plan was adopted, and which has rendered the employment of the poor more difficult, by authorising the sub-division of parishes; has greatly increased their number by confining them all to their respective districts; has given birth to the intricacy of our poor laws, by multiplying and rendering more easy the methods of gaining settlements; and, in consequence, has created an infinity of expensive lawsuits between contending neighbourhoods, concerning these settlements and removals."

Notwithstanding numerous attempts made from time to time to remedy the defects of the English poor law, the evils of the system reached such a height in 1833, that a commission of inquiry was issued—the evidence is condensed in a volume entitled, "Extracts from the Information received by his Majesty's Commissioners as to the Administration and Operation of the Poor Law. Published by authority." The evidence as to the tendency of a strict law of settlement for paupers, is to the following effect—that the general effect of the system is, to stop the circulation of labour (p. 267)—that the consequence of a labouring man having been frugal, and having saved money, was, that no one would employ him—"he must be reduced to a state of beggary before any one would employ him"—"he cannot get work in his own parish, and he will not be allowed to get work in other parishes." The witness says—"A labouring man who saves, where such an abominable system prevails, is foolish in doing so"—"as far as the circulation is concerned, the evil can only be put a stop to by utterly abolishing the law of settlement, and establishing an uniform national rate, so as to allow a man to be relieved at the place where he is in want, instead of being pinned to the soil."

Now, all through this evidence—though many witnesses find fault with the system of confining paupers to parishes—there is not one who views this restriction as encouraging to enterprise; and would not the individualizing of responsibility effect this "pinning to the soil," which in England was complained of so universally?

Besides instances of labourers who would have removed, if they could, before they became paupers, there is evidence, also, of another and more numerous class—where labourers would not remove, even where advantageous opportunities for so doing offered, lest, by so doing, they might lose their settlement.

The Rev. R. Bailey, Chaplain to the Tower, and who is stated as having had extensive opportunities of observing the operation of the poor laws in the rural districts, states, that he considers "the present law of settlement renders the peasant, to all intents and purposes, a bondman; he is chained to the soil by the operation of the system, and it forbids his acquiring property, or enjoying it openly or honestly." "There is no doubt that if the labourers were freed from their present trammels, there would be such a circulation of labour as would relieve the agricultural districts"—

"that the labourers of the parishes with which he was connected were fully aware that it was not their interest to advance their condition by the acquisition of property"—that "when the gentlemen in the neighbourhood of Henley contemplated the establishment of a savings bank, he thought it his duty to address the young men on the subject, after morning service, and urge upon them the propriety of saving, for their protection against the contingencies of sickness and old age. He was listened to attentively, and asked, whether he honestly thought it would not be for the benefit of the parish, more than of themselves, if they saved? and that, on consideration, he could not state that it would be for their benefit to save." "The decided conviction of the whole body of the labourers was, that any saving would be for the benefit of the parish and the farmers, and not for the benefit of the individual saving."

Here is an exhibition, in practice, of the natural result of confining labourers to a small district or parish, and, at the same time, requiring the farmers and owners of property to relieve its pauperism. And is not this what is meant by property supporting its poverty?

The evidence contains the most disgusting instances of immorality, both in the rate-payer and in the pauper, from the endeavour of the first to prevent, and the second to gain, a settlement—for these we must refer our readers to the book itself.

The report of the Rev. H. P. Jeston, Rector of the parish of Cholesbury, representing the state of his parish, gives a picture so similar to the present state of many of the distressed localities in Ireland, that we cannot avoid transcribing it: "The present state of the parish [January, 1833] is this, the land almost wholly abandoned (sixteen acres only, including cottage gardens, being now in cultivation)—the poor thrown upon the rates, and set to work upon the roads and gravel pits, at the expense of another parish;" and he observes, "so long as it continues a parish of its present small extent, with its present number of poor, the property must be an incumbrance to the proprietor; for he can expect no rent, the rates assessed upon the land far exceeding its value." On this communication, the Assistant Poor Law Commissioner made the following observations:—"It is obvious that the instant the poor rate exceeds the nett surplus produce, the existing cultivation becomes not only unprofitable, but a source of absolute loss; and that as every diminution of cultivation has a double effect in increasing the rate on the remaining cultivation—the number of unemployed labourers being increased at the same instant that the fund for the payment of rates is diminished—the abandonment of property, where it has once begun, is likely to proceed in a constantly accelerated ratio."—p. 89.

Must we never profit by the experience of others? Must Ireland go through years of misery, as England did, to learn that a stringent law of settlement is ruinous to the proprietor and to the farmer, and demoralizing to the pauper? Ireland is not yet entangled within the meshes of this system—she may yet avoid it—but let her proprietors and great ones reflect, that if they once get in, they will find it very difficult to disentangle themselves.

—Facilis descensus avari est,
Sed revocare gradum,
Hoc opus hic labor est.

It may be said, that the evils detailed in the evidence alluded to, were removed by a subsequent act, but it must not be forgotten that these evils were the consequence of, and attributed to, a stringent law of settlement, and yet not so stringent as that now demanded by that body of the Irish proprietors who insist that each estate must support its own poor.

To remedy those evils, the 4th & 5th Wm. 4, c. 76, was passed. On this occasion, as the Roman senate had recourse to dictators in cases of great emergency and danger, so the legislature had recourse to the Poor Law Commissioners to extricate them from the difficulties in which they found the country involved. However, there is this great difference between the two appointments—the Roman dictator was called into power for a very limited period, to put an end to the difficulties of his country, whilst the Poor Law Commission bids fair to be perpetual; and there is no anticipation of its putting an end to the embarrassments which called it into existence.

In the act, likewise, the legislature has declared its opinion as to the effect of confining the labouring poor within very confined districts; far from allowing parishes to be still further subdivided, it enacts in the 26th section, "that it shall be lawful for the Poor Law Commissioners, by order made under their hand and seal, to declare so many parishes as they may think fit, to be united for the administration of the law for the relief of the poor, and such parishes shall thenceforth be deemed a union for such purposes." Again, in the 33d sec. it enacts "that it shall be lawful for the guardians of parishes to agree that, for the purposes of settlement, such parishes may be considered as one parish, and the settlement of a poor person in any one of the parishes of said union shall be considered, as between the parishes, a settlement in such union." A plain intimation that the parliament of England, who were well acquainted with the effect of a stringent law of settlement, thought it would be for the advantage of the country to facilitate the circulation of labour—a salutary principle, which has obviated many of the evils it was introduced to counteract, and which is regarded with such apprehension by the majority of Irish proprietors.

Amongst the many evils incident to the law of settlement, the amount of litigation occasioned by it must not be considered as unworthy of notice. This arose to such a height as in the 11 & 12 Vic. to call forth a special act of parliament to check it. And though, since then, litigation may have been diminished, there is yet quite enough, arising from disputes as to settlement, to occupy the almost exclusive attention of the English Quarter Session Courts.

Does any one deny that individualizing responsibility will lead to a law of settlement? If each proprietor be held responsible for the support of the poor on his own estate, he will, doubtless, take care that no additional families shall intrude on him; he will also employ or feed only his own poor. Here we recognize the features of a most stringent law of settlement; each pauper is fixed to a particular estate, and confined within its limits as completely as if it were bounded by an impassable barrier. The universal operation of such a system would lead to a total stagnation of labour, and reduce the pauper to a serf—he might well envy the beast of the field—who would pass into richer hands when his owner became unable to feed him.

Who are those who demand this individualizing of responsibility? Surely not the owners of property who have no capital, whose estates are embarrassed and overpeopled. Let the rich owners of unembarrassed property beware, lest, lured by the prospect of a transient advantage, they may place themselves within a system of machinery which will eventually crush them. Individualizing responsibility will ruin many estates, rates in aid will follow—

"Ehen!

Quam temere in poemet legem sancimus iniquam."

Do they expect that Irish peasants and labourers will be less slow than English in discovering that, by improving their circumstances, they are not benefitting themselves, but the proprietor? Do they expect that Irish landowners will be less astute than English in discovering reasons why they should not be burthened with a particular pauper, or less strenuous in asserting their supposed or invented legal rights? Do they imagine they will get Irish paupers to work without an object to gain, and Irish landlords to refrain from litigation when they have something to litigate for?

The framers of the Irish Poor Law might, with much advantage to the public, have studied the following passages from Blackstone:—

"A plan was formed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth more humane and beneficial than even feeding and clothing of millions, by affording them the means, with proper industry, to feed and clothe themselves; and the farther any subsequent plans for maintaining the poor have departed from this institution, the more impracticable, and even pernicious, their visionary attempts have proved."

"There is not a more necessary or more certain maxim in the frame or constitution of society, than that every individual must contribute his share in order to the well being of the community, and surely they must have been deficient in sound policy who suffer one-half a parish to remain idle, dissolute, and unemployed, and are at length amazed to find that the industry of the other half is not able to maintain the whole."

A Treatise of the Law of Property, as administered by the House of Lords. By SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. London, Sweet.

A MIND so active as that of the author could not rest happy without occupation, and our Ex-Chancellor has employed the period of his judicial leisure in the production of the work, the subject of our notice. It speaks well for that constitution of mind, which, after a life of no ordinary mental activity, can find itself so braced to labour and intellectual exercise, as still to devote itself to toil, and, without the necessity of exertion, to exert itself.

The author brings to his task qualifications peculiarly adapted to its successful accomplishment. His work, above all others, is not "written to-day from the learning of yesterday;" neither is his knowledge gained as he writes—as is the case of many a literary journeyman, who commences his subject trusting to readiness of perception rather than profundity of knowledge, and when it is completed, only then begins thoroughly to understand it; but the criticisms of Sir Edward Sugden are the result of thorough familiarity with the matter criticized—a familiarity derived from the study of a long life, quickened by the knowledge acquired as Advocate, sobered by that gained as Judge, and stimulated by a sense of self-love; for no one likes a decision to be reversed by a tribunal which is not acquiesced in as the most competent.

The first part of the work is devoted to a brief historical sketch of the history of the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and a very meagre statement of the various plans proposed for its amendment. The writing is always perspicuous, a characteristic which attaches to all the other works of the author. Without being an original or bold thinker, he is an excellent workman; he arranges his materials skillfully, with great regard to order, method, and arrangement; and his compositions are always well finished.

We pass over the well-known historical fact, that the House of Lords had no inherent jurisdiction either to hear causes or appeals, and that the right to the latter, after violent contests with the House of Commons, was at length established in 1675, in Dr. Shirley's case. The bounds of that jurisdiction are now pretty accurately defined; the House possesses no appellate jurisdiction over ecclesiastical, maritime, colonial, bankruptcy, or lunacy cases; but there is an appellate jurisdiction for the United Kingdom, for all cases at law or in equity, as to the latter, even—on interlocutory orders,—except those cases at law where a statute prescribes a particular mode of adjudication, and does not reserve the right of appeal. It was, indeed, doubted by Lord Eldon—and on what subject did he not doubt?—and by Lord Redesdale, that there was jurisdiction over cases disposed of summarily by the Courts below. An Irish case, O'Neill v. Fitzgerald, (3 Bli. N. S. 24,) so late as the year 1829, gave rise to the doubt. A clerk of the Court of Exchequer having forged cheques, transfers were fraudulently made of sums standing to the credit of one cause to the credit of another. The despoiled creditors moved that the Accountant-General should replace the stock; the contest by motion was between him and the Bank of Ireland. The Court decided against the Accountant-General, from which decision there was an appeal. The point of jurisdiction was started by Lord Redesdale, and was subsequently argued with distinguished ability by Mr. Hart, and also by Mr. Shadwell. To our minds, their arguments were convincing; there was, however, no direct adjudication; the case was sent back to the court of Exchequer, who declined to make any other order, and on its coming back to the House, that order was reversed without argument.

Such being the limits of the jurisdiction, has it been, or is it satisfactorily exercised?

We give the quotations of our author, which prove that in the mean, low, and profligate age in which Charles the Second reigned, it was not. Sir Mathew Hale observes, "Whatever the extraction of men be, yet they were not born with the knowledge of the municipal laws of a kingdom, nor could be supposed to be inspired with the knowledge of the law by the acquiescent or descent of a title of honour..... They daily observed that in particular cases when they came before a multitude of judges, especially that were great men, and therefore not easily controllable, persons concerned in suits met with some that were their kindred, friends, favourites, landlords, tenants, or relatives, and it was grown a fashion in the Lords' House, for lords to patronize petitions—a course that, if it were used by the judges in Westminster Hall, would be looked on even by parliament itself, as undecent. Such addresses were undecent, indeed intolerable to be found among judges, who must not know persons in judgment, nor be sweetened by such kind of applications."

And Lord Shaftesbury, in his speech in Dr. Shirley's case, "prayed the lords to forgive him if, on this occasion, he put them in mind of committee dinners, and the scandal of it, those droves of ladies that attended all causes; it was come to that pass, that men, even hired or borrowed of their friends, handsome sisters or daughters to deliver their petitions. But yet, for all that, he must say, that their judgments had been sacred, unless in one or two causes."

We shall probably be excused for our incredulity, if we doubt the truth of the last sentence, more especially when we quote the further influence brought to bear. Burnet mentions that Charles the Second went commonly to the House of Lords, and "became a common solicitor, not only in public affairs, but even in private matters of justice. He would in a very little time have gone round the house, and have spoken to every man that he thought worth speaking to, and he was apt to do that upon the solicitation of any of the ladies in favour, or of any that had credit with them. He knew well on whom he could prevail; so being once, in a matter of justice, desired to speak to the Earl of Essex, and the Lord Hollis, he said they were stiff and sullen men; but when he was next desired to solicit two others, he undertook to do so, and said 'They are men of no conscience, so I will take the government of their conscience into my own hands.' Yet when any of the lords told him plainly that they could not vote as he desired, he seemed to take it well from them."

Now, however, the case is very different; then the lay lords attended numerously, now they altogether abandon this branch of their duties, and delegate them to the few law lords who have been honoured with a peerage. The instances in which the lay peers have attended and voted on law questions, are remarkably few. For the last hundred and fifty years, as collected by our author, and in the note to O'Connell and others v. the Queen, (11 Clark & Finely, 425), they do not exceed eight, some of them cases of fact, or involving a question of public right and importance. Reeve v. Long was the first, and there the judgment was reversed, against the opinion of all the judges, and on general principle and common sense, very properly reversed—it having been decided by the court below, that in the case of a contingent executory limitation, a posthumous son deriving under a will, could not take, where the particular estate determined before he came into esse.

* Hale, as judge on circuit, was by custom entitled to six loaves of sugar from a corporation, which he insisted upon paying for, because the corporation had a case before him for trial.

The next was that of Cary v. Bertie, which was an appeal from the Chancellor, and where there was a limitation over in the event of the lady not marrying a particular individual within a limited time, which she did not do. The parties interested were both of high birth, and a pamphlet was written against the Chancellor, by Mr. Bertie, the husband of the lady.

The third, Ashby v. White, was a very proper case for the lay lords to vote upon. The judges were as nearly as possible divided, the question being whether an action on the case would lie against the sheriff, for refusing the vote of a burgess. It was held in the court below it would not, and this decision was reversed.

The next great case was the celebrated Douglas one, where the question was one of legitimacy, purely one of fact, and on which a lay lord was quite competent to form an opinion.

The cases of Fitzgerald v. Fauconberge, Alexander v. Montgomery, and Hill v. St. John, were legal questions, and which probably had been better left to the law lords. The last was that of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, where the question arose as to the illegality of a general resignation bond. The House of Lords, contrary to the settled law, and to the opinion of all the judges, on the general question, held such a bond to be illegal. They were, perhaps, right on general principle, but the better course would have been, to have legislated, as they subsequently did, upon the subject, and not to have run counter to the universal opinion of the judges.

The last important general case was that of the Queen v. O'Connell, and in that case—in our judgment, very weakly—the lay lords abandoned one of the highest functions with which they have been entrusted by the constitution of this country.

We shall, in a future number, return to the interesting work we have been, more extracting from than reviewing.

17. That after the passing of this act any person claiming any interest in any land or lease may enter a caveat in the office of the registrar of the court against the sale of such land or lease, by order of the court or otherwise, and in such caveat shall be mentioned the place of abode of such person, or some place of address to which notices may be sent; and such person shall be entitled to and shall have notice of all subsequent proceedings to be taken upon any reference under this act relating to the land or lease mentioned in such caveat; (that is to say,) where the place of abode or address mentioned in such caveat shall be in the city of Dublin such notice shall be served on such person personally or left with some inmate of such place of abode or address, being of the age of sixteen years or upwards, and where such place of abode or address shall be elsewhere than in the city of Dublin, such notice shall be transmitted through the Post Office, addressed to such person at such place of abode or address.

18. That all persons claiming any interest in such inquiries in the usual manner may appear before the master under any reference under this act, and claim to take a part in the proceedings under the reference, and the master shall have power to determine what parties may attend before him and take a part in the proceedings under the reference, and upon what terms; and the master in his report under any reference shall state by what persons he has been attended, and also what (if any) persons, and in respect of what inquiries, he has prohibited from attending before him, and also what (if any) persons shall after notice to them have neglected to attend; provided that no omission of the master to cause any such notice to be given shall vitiate any proceedings before the master, unless the court, upon application, or otherwise, in the course of proceedings in the matter in which such reference shall have been made, shall determine otherwise.

19. That any person whose attendance before him the master shall have disallowed, and also any person complaining of any act of the master in any case not specially provided for, or requiring the direction or order of the court in any proceeding before the master, may apply to the court against such disallowance, act, or proceeding, or for such direction or order, but so that no such application complaining of any disallowance, act, or proceeding of the master shall, without special leave of the court, be made, unless within fourteen days after the act complained of, if the court be then sitting, and if the court shall not be then sitting, unless notice of such intention to apply at the sitting of the court be given within fourteen days to the party petitioning for such sale.

20. That all the directions in this act as to proceedings before the master and in court shall have such and the same force as if the same were orders of the court, and the court shall have such and the same powers and authorities in relation to all such proceedings and in relation to the costs of or incident thereto, as the court would have if such directions were orders of the court, and were not expressly contained herein.

21. That when any incumbrance shall be subject to any limitations of estate or interest, or shall be held upon any trust, the first person entitled to the income of such incumbrance, or the trustee or other person whom the court may think fit, shall be the person to make any application or give any consent under this act in respect of such incumbrance.

22. That where any person who shall be entitled to any charge not being an incumbrance within this act (including any such apportioned charge as herein-after mentioned) shall be willing to accept a gross sum in satisfaction of such charge, the master, if he shall think fit, may treat and include in his report such charge as an incumbrance within this act; and that where any land or lease a part only of which shall be contracted to be sold shall be subject to any such charge not being an incumbrance or to any incumbrance from which the land or lease contracted to be sold shall not be otherwise discharged under the provisions of this act, the master, if he shall see fit, may approve of the part not contracted to be sold of such land or lease being charged with such charge or incumbrance in exoneration of the land or lease contracted to be sold, or to approve of an apportionment of such charge or incumbrance between the land or lease to be sold and the residue of the land or lease subject thereto, with the consent in either case of all parties interested in the part of such land or lease not contracted to be sold, and to include such matters in his report: provided that a sale by order of the court may be made before all the accounts of incumbrances are taken, or the rights of incumbrancers ascertained, if the court shall so direct.

23. That the report of the master as to the expediency of sale, and all other reports, affidavits, orders, and other proceedings, shall, so far as consistent with the provisions of this act, or with any rule or order of the court, or of the Lord Chancellor, to be made as herein-before provided, be filed according to the rules and practices of the court in causes or matters; and that at the expiration of fourteen days after the filing of the report, as to parties who shall have appeared before the master, and as to all other persons, at the expiration of one month after the filing of any report approving of a sale, if no application shall be made, or shall be pending before the court, complaining of such report, or of any proceedings of the master under the reference under which such report shall have been made, the court, upon the application of any party interested in such report, (and without the attendance of counsel, unless the court shall see fit to direct such attendance), may confirm the report, and to direct a sale to be made by the master, and that after confirmation of such report no person shall make any application complaining of the same without special leave of the court.

24. That any order for sale to be made by the court, may include the whole, or any part or parts of the incumbered land or lease, and may provide that the land or lease, or the part or parts thereof to be sold, shall remain subject to any incumbrance which the court shall think fit; and such order shall specify the land or lease, or the part or parts thereof, which shall be directed to be sold, and also the incumbrances and charges (if any) to remain charged on the land or lease to be sold, and also the incumbrances and charges (if any) to remain charged on any land or lease, or part or parts thereof, not included in the sale, and whether such incumbrances and charges are to be charged on any such land or lease or part thereof exclusively, or in common with any other land or lease or part thereof, and whether with priority of charge, or liability in respect of any such land or lease or part thereof, or otherwise, and all such other matters incident to the sale as the court shall think fit.

25. That it shall be lawful for the court to order the whole of any incumbered land or lease to be sold, although the master shall have approved of the sale of a part thereof, or to order a further or other part or further or other parts thereof to be sold than what the master shall have approved, and to alter or vary such report, and the plan or scheme therein contained, and to confirm such report, subject to such variations, without any further reference to the master.

26. That previously to making any order for sale the court may make any order of confirmation of the report nisi, and direct service of such order on any person or persons, and also the court, in the course of any proceedings under this act, may direct any reference back to the master to review such report, and upon any terms and with any directions, the court shall think fit.

27. That the assurance of the land or lease sold by order of the court shall be made in such form in all respects as the master shall direct, and that the master shall execute the same, and execution thereof by any other party shall not be necessary for the validity thereof, nevertheless the master may direct any other persons to execute the same, for the purpose of witnessing for title, or for the production of title deeds and evidences, or otherwise; and the assurance shall be made to the purchaser, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, or as he shall direct; and in case the assurance shall be a conveyance upon a sale of land under this act the same shall be effectual to pass the land thereby expressed to be conveyed, and the fee simple and inheritance thereof, to the uses and in manner therein limited and expressed, discharged from all former and other estates, rights, titles, charges, and incumbrances whatsoever of her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and of all other persons whomsoever, save such charges and incumbrances, shall be thereby excepted, and as herein-after provided; and in case such assurance shall be a conveyance or assignment of a lease in perpetuity or other lease as aforesaid, such assurance shall pass the estate created or agreed to be created by such lease then remaining unexpired, subject to the rent and covenants annexed to the reversion, but discharged from all rights, titles, charges, and incumbrances whatsoever affecting the leasehold title or interest, save and except such charges and incumbrances, if any, as shall be thereby excepted, or expressed to be or to remain charged upon such leasehold estate or interest, and except also as herein-after provided.

28. That no such assurance shall prejudice the rights of any lessee, tenant, or occupier in possession, nor the rights of any lessee or under lessee at a rent, subject to whose lease or under lease the petitioning owner or incumbrancer applying to the court under this act shall be an owner or incumbrancer, nor any right of common, nor any right of way or other easement, nor any rent-charge in lieu of tithes, crown rent, or quit rent, charged upon any land, except in respect of the apportioned part, of any such rent-charge, crown rent, or quit rent from which the same shall be expressed to be discharged by such conveyance under the provisions herein contained.

29. That subject as herein-after mentioned, the purchase money to arise on any sale by order of the court under this act shall be paid into the bank of Ireland, in the name of the Accountant-general, to his account in the matter of "The Act to facilitate the Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland," ex parte as aforesaid, to the credit of the matter of such sale, or as the court shall direct, and the same shall be applied in payment of the incumbrances which affected the land or lease from the sale of which such purchase money shall have arisen, by order of the court from time to time made upon petition to be preferred by any person entitled under this act.

30. That where any land, or any lease in perpetuity of land in Ireland, shall be subject to an incumbrance or incumbrances, the owner of such land or lease may, without the order of the court, sell such land or lease, or any part thereof, and upon payment of the purchase money into the bank of Ireland in manner herein-after provided to convey such land or lease to the purchaser, &c., unless after such publication of notice as herein-after directed such sale or conveyance shall be restrained by order of the court under the provision herein-after contained.

31. That where any land, or any lease in perpetuity of any land in Ireland, shall be subject to an incumbrance or incumbrances, the incumbrancer entitled to any such incumbrance, in case the principal money owing on such incumbrance shall be actually payable, or in case any interest thereon shall be in arrear for twelve months or upwards, may give notice in manner herein-after provided to the owner of such land or lease, requiring him to discharge the money due and payable on the incumbrance of such incumbrancer for principal, interest, and costs, or to proceed to raise a fund for the discharge thereof by sale; and in case such owner shall not at the expiration of six months after such notice pay the money then due on such incumbrance for principal, interest, and costs, and shall not have published notice by advertisement of his intention to sell such land or lease, or a part sufficient for the discharge of the money due and payable on foot of such incumbrance for principal, interest, and costs, the incumbrancer, without the order of the court absolutely, may sell such land or lease, as the case may be, or any part thereof, and upon payment of the purchase money into the bank of Ireland to convey such land or lease to the purchaser, &c., unless after such publication of notice as herein-after provided such sale or conveyance shall be restrained by order of the court under the provision herein-after contained; and where at the expiration of such six months such owner shall not have paid the money due on such incumbrance, but shall have published notice by advertisement of his intention to sell such land or lease, and shall subsequently neglect to sell in pursuance of such notice, the court, upon the application of such incumbrancer, by petition in a summary way, may direct that such incumbrancer shall have the benefit of such publication and notice by advertisement, and thereupon such incumbrancer may sell as such owner might have done, and the conveyance by such incumbrancer shall have the same operation as a conveyance by such owner, but except for the purposes of this provision such sale and conveyance by such incumbrancer shall be deemed a sale and conveyance without the order of the court; provided that no incumbrancer shall sell or give notice as herein provided of his intention so to do, unless the principal sum of two hundred pounds at the least shall be owing on his incumbrance.

32. That where incumbrancers entitled to more than one such incumbrance as aforesaid shall have given several notices to such owner, and such owner shall not have paid the money due and payable on such incumbrances, and shall not have published notice of his intention to sell, or having published such notice shall have subsequently neglected to sell, such of the incumbrancers by whom notice shall have been given to such owner as shall be entitled to the first incumbrance in order of priority shall have the power of selling and conveying which one incumbrancer giving notice to the owner would have had under the provisions herein-before contained; but upon the refusal or neglect of the incumbrancer entitled to such first incumbrance to exercise such power of selling, the court, upon the application by petition in a summary way of any other of the incumbrancers who shall have given notice to the owner, may direct that the incumbrancer so applying may exercise the power of selling and conveying which might have been exercised by the incumbrancer so refusing; but, except for the purposes of this provision, a sale and conveyance in exercise of such power shall be deemed a sale and conveyance without the order of the court.

33. That the notice to be given by an incumbrancer to an owner as aforesaid shall be given in writing to such owner or left at his usual place of abode, or in case such owner or his place of abode shall not be known, or in case such owner shall be out of the United Kingdom, or in case from any other cause the incumbrancer shall be unable to give such notice, such incumbrancer may file an affidavit in the court showing his inability to give such notice, and thereupon the court, upon the application of such incumbrancer, by petition in a summary way, may direct that such notice shall be served upon such owner wherever resident, or that service thereof upon his solicitor and land agent shall be deemed good service thereof on such owner, or to direct the substitution of service of such notice as to the court shall seem fit.

34. That every owner and every incumbrancer who shall propose to sell any land or lease without the order of the court shall cause notice of his intention so to sell to be published at least once in four successive weeks in the Dublin Gazette, and in two newspapers published in Dublin, and in one newspaper published or circulating in the county in which the land shall be situate, and in the London Gazette, and shall cause a copy of such notice to be posted in one or both of such two weeks on the church (if any), and on the Roman Catholic chapel (if any), and where there shall be no such church or chapel on some public or conspicuous place of the parish, or of each of the parishes in which the land shall be situated, and on the court where the sessions of the peace for the division of a county at large or for the city or town or county of a city or town in which the land shall be situated are usually holden; and where any person shall have entered a caveat in the office of the registrar against the sale of any land or lease under the provisions of this act, every such owner and incumbrancer shall cause a copy of such notice to be served in one of such weeks on such person in manner herein-after mentioned; (that is to say,) where the place of abode or address mentioned in such caveat shall be in the city of Dublin shall cause such copy to be served on such person personally, or to be left with some inmate of such place of abode or address, and where such place of abode or address shall be elsewhere than in the city of Dublin shall transmit such copy through the Post Office, addressed to such person at such place of abode or address as aforesaid, and such notice shall state the name and addition or title of the owner, and if the sale shall be proposed to be made by an incumbrancer the name and addition or title of such incumbrancer, and the intention of such owner or incumbrancer, to sell under the provisions of this act without the order of the court, and in case such owner shall not be entitled absolutely to such land or lease, or to the equity of redemption thereof, shall mention the settlement, will, or other assurance under which he shall be owner, and if such sale shall be proposed to be made by an incumbrancer shall mention the incumbrance under which he shall be such an incumbrancer, and in every case shall state the denomination or sub-denomination or short description of the land or lease proposed to be sold, and the county and the barony or parish or place wherein such land or the land comprised in such lease shall be situate, and all the incumbrances affecting such land or lease known to the person proposing to sell the same, and any other matters which may from time to time be directed or required by such orders of the court as herein-after mentioned; and no such sale without order of the court shall be made under this act before the expiration of three months after the publication of the last of such advertisements as aforesaid, in the computation of which period of three months the months of September and October shall be excluded; and it shall be lawful for any incumbrancer or person interested in the land or lease proposed to be sold before the expiration of such three months to apply to the court by petition, and the court, upon such petition, having reference to the amount and nature of the interests of the person proposing to sell, and of the incumbrancer so applying to the court, and to all the circumstances of such land or lease, and of the incumbrance or incumbrances affecting the same, may restrain the person proposing to sell as aforesaid from proceeding with such sale, either as respects the whole of the land or lease, or as respects any part or parts thereof, which it may appear to the court unnecessary to sell, or may require security to be given to such petitioner, or may give to such petitioner the conduct or right of supervision of the proposed sale, so far as the court may not restrain the same, or may make such order in relation to such petition and to costs as the court shall think fit; and the Lord High Chancellor of Ireland, with the Master of the Rolls, may make from time to time orders prescribing and regulating the particulars to be included in the notices of such sales, and such other orders for or concerning such notices, as shall appear necessary for ensuring the knowledge by incumbrancers and persons interested of the sales proposed to be made.

35. That where the owner of any land which shall be proposed to be sold without order of the court shall not be entitled for an estate of inheritance in possession to such land, the owner or incumbrancer who shall propose to sell such land shall cause a copy of such notice of his intention so to sell to be served personally, or in such manner as under the rules and orders of the court would be deemed equivalent to personal service, on all persons except such owner having estates in remainder or other future estates in such land other than such estates, if any, as may be subsequent to the first vested estate of inheritance therein; and where the owner of any lease which shall be proposed to be sold as aforesaid without order of the court shall not be entitled for the whole estate created or agreed to be created by such lease, the owner or incumbrancer who shall propose to sell such lease shall cause a copy of such notice to be served personally, or in such manner as aforesaid, on all persons except such owner having remainders or future estates in such lease other than such remainders or estates, if any, as may be subsequent to the first vested estate quasi in tail therein; and such notices shall be given before the publication of such notices by advertisement as aforesaid; or where any such person entitled to any such remainder or future estate, except as aforesaid, in such land or lease shall be infant, idiot, lunatic, or a married woman, a copy of such notice shall be so served on the father or guardian of any such person being an infant, or on the committee of any such person being an idiot or lunatic, or on the husband of any such person being a married woman; and where any such infant shall not have a guardian, or the father of such infant shall be the person proposing to sell, or where any such idiot or lunatic shall not have a committee duly appointed, or where any notice required by this provision cannot be given, the person proposing to sell may apply to the court by petition; and the court may order notice to be given to any other person, for and on behalf of such infant, idiot, or lunatic, and in such manner and within such time as the court may direct, or to direct any substituted service of any such notice; and every person on whom such notice shall be served on behalf of any such infant, idiot, or lunatic, shall have the like power of applying to the court in relation to such sale as such infant, idiot, or lunatic would have had if free from disability.

36. That no such notice of an intention to sell any land or lease shall prejudice or affect the right of any mortgagee or other incumbrancer of or upon such land or lease to commence any proceeding for redemption, foreclosure, or other proceedings at law or in equity, or the right of any mortgagee of such land or lease who shall have under the security a power of sale which has arisen and may be exercised, to proceed to the exercise of such power of sale, any time before a sale shall have been made under this act.

Sir,

"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has no advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture; it is susceptible of a very high polish, it does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY 24, 1849.

THE universally acknowledged improvement made by the great Alfred in the laws of England, and transmitted—with variations from time to time—from his age to our own, was the establishment of tribunals for the trial of all causes, civil and criminal, in the very districts where the complaints arose. This principle has been partly carried out in Ireland, by dividing the kingdom into circuits, and commissioning judges to administer justice in the several counties; by the establishment of sessions of the peace to be held at stated periods in certain towns, and lastly, by the establishment of Petty Session courts.

Of these, the last—the Petty Session Courts—carry out much better than either of the others the great object of the common law, namely, the distribution of justice with cheapness, expedition, and ease. Considerable summary jurisdiction has been conferred on these courts from time to time by statute, and they have lately, by an act of the last session, received an increase, by having their summary jurisdiction extended over cases of simple larceny, when the age of the offender does not exceed fourteen years.

By this salutary enactment justices of the peace are empowered to convict and sentence juvenile offenders, in place of—as was the former practice,—sending them for trial to the next Quarter Sessions, and thus exposing them in the meantime, to the degradation and contamination of a prison, which, however necessary it may be to society, rarely has a beneficial effect on a prisoner.

In this act also there is a further power given to justices of the peace to admit to bail. There is no power committed into the hands of those who are charged with the distribution of justice among the lower orders of the Irish population, in the exercise of which a greater latitude should be allowed to the discretion of the magistrate, than in that of admitting to bail. In many cases it would lead to great hardship even to require bail from a prisoner, though convicted. This is so plainly seen by magistrates in districts where trivial assaults—from hastiness of temper, without malice—are constantly occurring, that the following practice has arisen. In these trivial assault cases magistrates have a summary jurisdiction, and the offender, if convicted, is sentenced to pay a penalty, (generally a small one) or, in default of payment, to be confined for some short period in the county gaol; in some instances the fine is paid at once; where it is not, application is generally made to the court by the convicted parties, to liberate them till the next court day, on their engaging to appear in court on that day, and either pay the fine, or surrender themselves prisoners. Liberty is generally given, and though we have seen this indulgence very frequently accorded, we do not remember an instance where the parties have broken faith. In the generality of cases the fines were paid on the next court day, the money having been procured in the mean time; and, where the fines were not paid, the parties uniformly came in, and voluntarily surrendered. Among a poor population the expense of bail bonds, though very moderate, would be a greater obstacle to the liberation of prisoners than the procuring of sureties, and, in some instances, the expense would equal the penalty inflicted by the court.

Petty Session Courts derive their chief value from their being held so frequently, and their existing in every locality, thus distributing justice at every man's own door, with very little expense or delay.

The 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 75—the act by which the jurisdiction of the civil bill courts in Ireland is extended, and their proceedings regulated—intended that the distribution of justice, through the Quarter Session Courts, should be almost as general and convenient, but its provisions have not been in all instances properly carried out.

The 53d section, after reciting, that "it would facilitate the administration of justice, if a sufficient number of places were appointed for hearing, and determining causes by civil bill, and transacting the criminal, and other business at a general Quarter Sessions of the peace," enacts "that it shall, and may be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, or other chief governor of Ireland, by and with the advice and consent of the Privy Council, to divide the several counties of Ireland, or any of them, or any riding, or division of a county, into as many districts as shall be thought proper or expedient, for the purpose of more conveniently hearing and determining causes by civil bill, and of transacting all such criminal, and all such other business, as may be cognisable, or determinable at any general or Quarter Sessions of the peace; and to appoint one or more convenient town or place, towns or places, in any such district in which a civil bill court, and a court for transacting such criminal and other business as aforesaid, shall be held. And every such district shall be distinguished by the name of such town or place. And every such session, and adjournment thereof, shall be good and effectual for the administration of criminal business, and civil bill cases, and doing all other business that may by law be done at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace." And again it is enacted in section 59—"that it shall, and may be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, or other chief governor of Ireland for the time being, by, and with the consent of the Privy Council, to direct that a general session of the peace and civil bill court shall be held four times in every year, in any or all of the times appointed for holding sessions. And the Lord Lieutenant, or other chief governor of Ireland for the time being, shall nominate and appoint the baronies, or half baronies, or parishes, for which respectively such sessions shall be held."

By this enactment the legislature seems to have done much to facilitate the administration of justice through these courts. Pursuant to these provisions, counties have been divided into districts, and places have been appointed for holding quarter sessions; but, that the arrangements made are not as conducive to public convenience as they might be, it is our intention to point out.

When informations are received by magistrates at Petty Sessions they are returned to the next Quarter Sessions for the division or district; now some of these divisions are very large; for instance in the Ballina division, in the county of Mayo, two of the Quarter Session towns, Belmullet and Swineford, are upwards of fifty Irish miles apart, and cases are constantly sent for trial from the Belmullet Petty Sessions to the Swineford Quarter Sessions. This is a great hardship both to the prosecutor, and the prosecuted, who are under the necessity of bringing their witnesses upwards of fifty miles from their homes, and of supporting them in a strange town until the trial comes on. In civil cases, likewise, considerable inconvenience is constantly experienced. At Belmullet, Quarter Sessions are held but once a year; hence, as plaintiffs, may bring their processes at any Quarter Sessions in the division, parties are constantly taken, with their witnesses, to Swineford, upwards of fifty miles, or to Ballina, upwards of thirty, to defend themselves; or obliged, —when it is necessary to obtain a decree without delay—to proceed at the sessions held in either of these towns, occasioning much unnecessary hardship and expense; and further, processing for an unjust or doubtful demand, to a distant session, is sometimes successfully resorted to, to extort money by way of compromise, the defendant preferring to pay a small sum, to undertaking a long journey, which he must do if he adopt the alternative of defending himself.

Appeals, too, against the valuation of rateable property under the poor law, from the Belmullet district, would also be tried at either of these distant towns, unless its annual quarter sessions happened to take place within the time limited by law for appealing.

These inconveniences—if they do not deserve some worse name—are obviously the consequence of the great extent of the divisions, and of sessions not being held with sufficient frequency in some of the towns. This division of the county of Mayo is not a solitary instance, though, from its great size, it perhaps exhibits the faults of the system more glaringly than they appear elsewhere.

In poor districts, such as that county, the present arrangement should be altered, by diminishing the size of the district and increasing the number of Quarter Sessions within the year; or the jurisdiction of the Petty Session Courts should be extended, so as to embrace all simple contract debts of small amount. It seems almost ridiculous that wages can be recovered in these courts, and yet that in all other, even the most trifling simple contract debts—and, among a poor population, the great majority of those debts are very trifling indeed—recourse must be had to another, and often a distant tribunal, and one in which the cost of the proceeding, though very moderate, is frequently greater than the debt proceeded for. However, there is no necessity for a new enactment, as the provisions alluded to, if carried out in their true spirit, would render the Quarter Sessions Court sufficiently convenient for every purpose.

A Treatise of the Law of Property as administered by the House of Lords. By Sir Edwd. Sugden. London, Sweet.

WHEN we stated in our last number that in our judgment the lay lords had, in the case of O'Connell v. the Queen, weakly abandoned one of the highest functions with which they have been entrusted by the constitution, we should, perhaps, have qualified the statement so far as to limit our condemnation to the fact of their not attending as judges, rather than that of their not voting. We think they—or those of them who had not heard the arguments—acted quite rightly in not voting when they had not been present during the consideration of the case, and had not throughout acted as judges. But we also think that not only on this, but on other occasions, by not taking part in the appeal business of the country, they have culpably neglected one branch of their duty, and delegated their entire appellate jurisdiction to a few law lords. They have been invested with a very solemn trust—they have been for two centuries the arbiters of the nicest and most critical points of law in the last resort. "Yet, vast as this trust is, it can no where be so properly reposed as in the noble hands where our excellent constitution has placed it, because, from the independence of their fortunes, and the dignity of their station, they are presumed to employ that leisure, which is the consequence of both, in attaining a more extensive knowledge of the law than persons of inferior rank, and because the founders of our polity relied upon that delicacy of sentiment, so peculiar to noble birth, which as, on the one hand, it will prevent either interest or affection from interfering in questions of right, so, on the other, it will bind a peer in honour, an obligation which the law esteems equal to another's oath, to be master of those points upon which it is his birthright to decide."

So wrote Sir Wm. Blackstone nearly a hundred years ago, and the same point was earlier urged with as much force, and more quaintness, in the Doctor and Student, "As for knights and other nobles of the realm, me-seemeth that they should be bound to take knowledge of the law. * * *

And therefore if the noblemen of this realm would see their children brought up in such manner that they should have learning and knowledge more than they have commonly used to have in time past, specially of the grounds and principles of the law of the realm wherein they be inherit, (though they had not the high cunning of the whole body of the law) I suppose it would be a great help hereafter to the ministration of justice, a great surety for the prince, and a right great gladness to all the people."

Admittedly, however, the great majority of the members of the Upper House have not devoted themselves to the study of the law, neither for the reasons assigned by Blackstone, nor for any others, and they have not rendered themselves competent judges in the last resort; the duty was one of imperfect obligation, which they have not fulfilled, and they have in consequence felt themselves unfitted to form an independent judgment, and, whenever they attended at the hearing of appeals, they were on all questions of law either cyphers—following the advice of the Chancellor—or, if self-opinionated, their decision was mischievous, as calculated to unsettle the pre-existing law.

The "delicacy of sentiment" to which our great commentator alludes, was a very proper reason for the lay lords not voting in Mr. O'Connell's case, but their abstaining from so doing, for the reasons put by Lord Wharnccliffe, was tantamount to a confession of incompetence, and it must now be taken as conceded, that their appellate jurisdiction is confided to the few law lords whom professional eminence has raised to the peerage, and who are thus in truth its pillars.

Do then the few hands to whom this most arduous duty has been delegated, perform it satisfactorily? Our author thinks not:—"Undoubtedly much is required. Fixation of law, general rules not simply binding in law, and the guides which judges are bound to follow, but well founded in law, and carrying with them the opinions of the great lawyers of the day, and satisfying succeeding generations. . . . It is rarely that any great principles of law are enunciated there; that any clear fixed rule is laid down as a rule for other courts."

This he attributes to a variety of causes; the frequent disagreements of the Lords, their never meeting and agreeing upon one uniform judgment, and the unsatisfactory nature of the early reports of the decisions. He admits, however, the present jurisdiction to have its excellences. "If the audience is not large, yet the court is open to all, and the importance of the place, the distance of the counsel from the judge, and the power which all the lords have of attending, afford an opportunity of being heard to advantage which no other place could give."

Our own early impressions of the austere dignity of the House of Lords, when sitting as the supreme court of judicature, were much lessened, if not wholly removed, on acquaintance; that solemn sanctity which invested it with a sort of mysterious awe in our imagination, was dispelled on closer scrutiny.

Whether the chamber of justice in the new House of Lords may be more imposing than that in the last, we have had no opportunity of judging, but the last certainly was not much calculated to excite feelings of legal reverence.

It was a room of no extraordinary dimensions. The place for the audience exceedingly limited—mere standing ground under the reporter's gallery—that for the bar exceedingly inconvenient, no better than a cockpit. Nor, on ordinary occasions, when the judges did not attend, was the appearance of the house itself imposing; the Chancellor alone was in his robes, the other law lords, few and far between, sat without any insignia of authority, or any very marked regard to attention and decorum. Lord Brougham, for instance, with an unvarying iniquitude of manner, at one moment busy taking a note of the argument, the next jumping up, and approaching the woolsack, luring the Chancellor into conversation, or failing in that, walking to the bar to ask a question, or called out for ten minutes, and then returning to an argument, the thread of which had been interrupted.

Sir Edward Sugden remarks:—"Noble lords should not feel themselves at liberty to occupy the attention of the Lord Chancellor with any other subject during the hearing, and above all the Lord Chancellor should give to the argument his undivided attention."

We cannot forbear quoting the following very sensible observations, which are as applicable to a judge sitting in any other court, as to one in the House of Lords:—

"Nothing discourages a counsel so much as the inattention of a judge; it has a tendency to render him indifferent to his argument, for it is very distressing when one of great labour is thrown away, and, if he persevere, it leads to repetition, which in its turn disgusts the judge, and the court and the bar become mutually dissatisfied with each other. If a judge give, as he ought to do, his undivided attention to the argument, he encourages the diligent, and stimulates the indolent, and he can always interpose with propriety when a counsel is rambling or repeating his argument. The great object of counsel must be to impress the judge with his view of the case, he always desires to succeed, when he is satisfied the judge comprehends him, his purpose is answered. The assistance which would be given to the House of Lords in a well regulated court of appeal, would at once impress upon it the forms of a court of justice, and as the highest, from which there is no appeal, it would feel bound to give its attention wholly to the cause, and would be able readily to keep counsel to the points really in dispute. It is not often possible to satisfy the losing side, but if the judge is incompetent or inattentive, the counsel who fails is sure to complain; his dissatisfaction quickly communicates itself to his client, the suitor, who has not the consolation which an attentive hearing and a well considered judgment would afford to him. Thus men's minds are soured, and they become, not without reason, discontented with the best institutions of the country."

Though Sir Edward Sugden was himself a formidable judge to plead before, yet no man seemed to appreciate more keenly an able argument, or on such occasions did the advocate greater justice.

We have lingered so long that we must pass by the proposed plans of our author, Lord Cottenham and Lord Langdale, for the improvement of the appellate jurisdiction. The body of the work contains a review of the decisions of the House of Lords upon the law of property. We believe it will be very useful to the practising lawyer, as it presents in a point the authorities bearing upon every question discussed, and shows how far the law may be considered settled. The deduction by the author of the law on each head, is not sufficiently clear, which we regret, as it would have added much to the practical utility of the work; which will be found more useful in suggesting arguments than removing difficulties.

The reader is naturally attracted to the review of those decisions which the author himself had made, and which were subsequently brought by appeal before the House of Lords.

In Heron v. Stokes, the author still maintains his own opinion, though very temperately. The questions arose on a will of personality. It was, undoubtedly, a case of considerable difficulty. Lord Plunket made a decree deciding that certain annuities were perpetual, grounding his judgment on a point of great importance, as he extended the rule in Wild's case, (6 Rep. 17,) as to real estate, to personality, namely, that if A. deviseth his lands to B., and to his children or issues, and he hath not any issue at the time of the devise, the same is an estate tail; but if a man devise lands to A. and to his children or issue, and they then have issue, they shall have but a joint estate for life. Sir E. Sugden after stating, "I do not know that I ever bestowed so much attention upon a case lying within so small a compass," reversed the previous decision, being of opinion that if the will stood alone, the annuities were perpetual, (not on the authority of Wild's case, as to which he had great doubts, as to the possibility of applying its doctrine to personal property,) because there was a gift of property producing the amount of the annuities, but he thought a subsequent codicil cut them down to life estates. The House of Lords reversed this decision, and held the annuities perpetual, on the ground stated by Sir Edward, that there was a gift of property producing the amount of the annuity, and that the gift being of a perpetual annuity, could not be cut down without "indication plain," which the codicils did not afford.

The value of the decision is not great, if it cannot be understood as affirming Lord Plunket's decree on the authority of Wild's case. Sir Edward observes truly enough, "It was decided upon another ground, and Lord Plunket's reliance on Wild's case was not supported on the re-hearing, or on the appeal." Now, directly it assuredly was not, but Lord Brougham stoutly defended the decision of Lord Plunket, and certainly agreed with him, 'that the rule in Wild's case of itself is applicable to personality.'

Lord Campbell was more doubtful—"I do not consider myself bound by Lord Chancellor Sugden's doctrine on this subject. I am not clear that this principle may not be applied to a bequest of personality."

Sir Edward, after vindicating himself from Lord Brougham's random charge—that he had looked to the margin of Wild's case, instead of to the case itself—by the most satisfactory proof in the world, as the only edition he possessed of Lord Coke's reports was that of 1727, in which there are no marginal notes, and having shewn that the noble lord could himself be inaccurate, labours with considerable success, by a review of all the authorities, to prove that the rule in Wild's case is inapplicable to personality, and not strictly adhered to in reality, and having thus disposed of Lord Plunket and Lord Brougham, he attacks the decision on the grounds by which his own was reversed, and implies that the lords, in effectuating the intention of the testator, have removed landmarks of the law.

The case, therefore, is deprived of all weight as a leading authority, and leaves the law in the most unsettled state possible. Is the rule in Wild's case, or is it not, applicable to personality?

The part devoted to the rights of husband and wife would interest the general, as well as the legal reader. Lord Brougham, in the case of Howard v. Digby, (2 Clark & Finely 684,) started some queer doctrines as to pin money, in a judgment which would read exceedingly well in a romance, or the Book of Beauty, or any work of light literature, but which, in the pages of a law report, savour amazingly of the burlesque. Sir Edward thinks the decision untenable, at least, not easily reconciled with the current of authorities; if it be any satisfaction to him to be able to add another case to those in which the authority of the House of Lords has not been acquiesced in, we can inform him that the present Lord Chancellor for Ireland has decided in a case, not yet reported, that pin money stands on no different footing from separate estate, and can be recovered in like manner.

37. That no land or lease shall be sold without the order of the court, unless the price at which the same shall be sold shall be equal to or exceed the sums which a surveyor appointed or authorized as herein-after mentioned shall certify in writing to be the fair selling value thereof; and the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors for the time being of Ireland may appoint or authorize, as occasion shall require, such and so many surveyors as he or they may think fit, to act as surveyors for the purposes of this act, and at pleasure to revoke any such appointment or authority; and such surveyors may be so appointed or authorized to act throughout Ireland, or for any counties, county, or division mentioned in such appointment or authority.

38. That where any person having entered a caveat under the provision herein-before contained shall in such caveat have signified his desire that notice be given to him of the price at which any sale shall be made, the owner or incumbrancer who shall sell as aforesaid shall, forthwith after entering into any contract for sale, and before the filing of such affidavit as herein-after mentioned, give notice in manner aforesaid to the person who shall have entered such caveat of the price at which such land or lease, or any part thereof, shall have been contracted to be sold.

39. That where any land or lease shall be sold under this act without the order of the court, the owner or incumbrancer by whom such sale shall be made shall file an affidavit in the court, which shall be made by such owner or incumbrancer, as the case may be, and his solicitor; and such affidavit shall set forth the notice which shall have been published by advertisement and otherwise as aforesaid of such sale, and shall state the dates of the several publications of such notice by advertisement, and shall also state that to the best of the knowledge and belief of the deponents such notice has been otherwise published and given as directed by this act, and shall state whether the whole or what part or parts of the land or lease described in such notice shall have been sold, and to whom, and shall state the amount of the purchase money, and the person by whom the same is to be paid, and that the purchase money was the best price that could be reasonably gotten at the time of such sale, and shall state the sum which shall have been certified by a surveyor authorized as aforesaid to be the fair selling value thereof, and, if a part or parts only of the land or lease shall have been sold, shall sufficiently describe the same by the description by which the same shall have been sold and conveyed, or shall be intended to be conveyed; and the deponents in such affidavit shall declare that such land or lease, or the part or parts thereof so sold, has or have been so sold without fraud, for the purpose of discharging an incumbrance or incumbrances affecting such land or lease, and where the sale shall be made by an incumbrancer, that the principal sum of two hundred pounds or upwards is justly owing on his incumbrance; and such affidavit shall also state, that before the publication of such notice by advertisement a negative search was made in the office for registering deeds, wills, and conveyances in Ireland, for a period of not less than sixty years next before the day of making certificate of such search (such day not being more than three months before the time of the first publication by advertisement of such notice) for the acts affecting such land, or the land comprised in such lease, of all persons by whose acts, according to the belief of the deponent, the land or lease described in such notice might have been affected in title or charge, and that a negative search was also made in the office for the registration of judgments and incumbrances affecting real estates in Ireland for such judgments and other incumbrances there registered within twenty years before the day of making certificate of such last-mentioned search (such day not being more than three months before the first publication by advertisement of such notice) against the several persons the judgments and incumbrances against whom would, in the judgment and belief of such deponents, have affected such land or lease, and that all the incumbrances appearing on such respective searches, except such (if any) as such deponents know to have been satisfied, or to have otherwise ceased to affect such land or lease, and all other incumbrances (if any) affecting such land or lease known to such respective deponents, were mentioned in such notice; and in case the sale shall have been made by an incumbrancer after notice to an owner, such affidavit shall also state that notice was given to the owner according to the provisions of this act; and such certificate of the fair-selling value, and the official certificates of such negative searches, shall be annexed to and filed with such affidavit; and the registrar of the court shall give a certificate of the filing of such affidavit, specifying the names of the deponents, the dates of the jurat, and of the filing, and such other particulars as he may think necessary to identify such affidavit, and shall state the amount of the purchase-money mentioned in such affidavit, and that such affidavit contain the statements required in an affidavit upon a sale without the order of the court under this act; provided that where such an affidavit as aforesaid shall have been filed upon a sale of a part of the land or lease described in such notice as aforesaid, it shall not be necessary in the affidavit to be filed upon any subsequent sale of other part or parts of the land or lease described in the same notice again to set forth such notice or the publications thereof, or the searches and statements in relation thereto, mentioned in such former affidavit, but reference may be made to the former affidavit, and to the copy of notice and statements of the publication, and searches in such former affidavit contained, and to the certificates of searches filed with such former affidavit.

40. That upon the delivery to the Accountant General of such certificate of the registrar, the purchase money mentioned in such certificate shall, without order of the court, be paid into the bank of Ireland, in the name and with the privity of the Accountant General, to his account in the matter of private sales, under the "Act to facilitate the Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland," in the credit of the persons interested in the land or lease mentioned in the affidavit, describing such affidavit by reference to the names of the deponents, and the dates of the jurat and filing, and otherwise as described in such certificate of the registrar; and such purchase-money shall be paid out or applied by order of the court made from time to time upon petition to be preferred in a summary way by any person entitled under this act; and unless within two months after payment into the bank of such purchase-money the court shall otherwise direct, such purchase-money shall, without order for this purpose, be invested by the Accountant General in the purchase in his name of any stocks, funds, or annuities transferable at the bank of Ireland.

41. That a separate register of the affidavits filed upon sales without order of the court under this act shall be kept, and any person shall have liberty at any reasonable time to inspect the same, on payment of the sum of two shillings and six pence for such inspection, and shall be furnished with a copy of any affidavit on payment after the rate of two pence for every seventy-two words contained in such copy.

42. That where such purchase-money shall be paid into the bank of Ireland, with the privity of the Accountant General, no defect or irregularity in the notices and affidavits, or the certificate of the registrar herein-before required, shall invalidate or affect such sale or the operation thereof.

43. That upon the payment of the purchase-money into the bank of Ireland the conveyance upon a sale without the order of the court shall, as from the execution thereof by the person selling, and without the execution of such conveyance by any other person, be an effectual disposition of the land or lease thereby expressed to be conveyed, as against the person making such conveyance, and as against the owner mentioned in the notice set forth in such affidavit, and all persons entitled or interested, or who may become entitled or interested, under the same settlement, will, or other assurance, if any, mentioned in such notice, and all persons entitled or interested, or who may become entitled or interested, under the incumbrances mentioned in such notice, and also as against all estates, rights, and interests, which the persons against whom such conveyance is made an effectual disposition, or the persons by whom such incumbrances shall have been created, at the time of such creation, or at any time afterwards, might have passed, barred, or prevented from taking effect, save and except the estates, rights, and interests of all lessees, tenants, and occupiers in possession, and of all lessees and under-lessees at rents subject to whose leases or under-leases the owner mentioned in such notice shall be owner of the land or lease expressed to be conveyed; and from and after the expiration of five years from the time of the payment of such purchase-money into the bank of Ireland as aforesaid, such conveyance shall have the same operation as if the sale and conveyance had been a sale and conveyance under the order of the court under the provisions herein-before contained.

44. That a conveyance without the order of the court shall not prejudice or affect any estate, right, or interest, (other than the estates, rights, or interests against which such conveyance is made effectual upon the payment of the purchase money into the bank of Ireland;) in case an entry, action, distress, or suit shall be made or brought on or in respect of such other estate, right, or interest before the expiration of such five years as aforesaid; and any person claiming any such estate, right, or interest in the land or lease comprised in such conveyance may apply to the court by petition in a summary way; and the court may, upon such petition, order that a sum be set apart to answer any claim in respect of such estate, right, or interest, or to be applied by way of payment in purchase of or compensation for the same, as the court may think fit.

45. That where any notice shall have been published, or other act done, in relation to a sale without the order of the court, and the owner or incumbrancer by whom such notice shall have been published, or other act done, shall die or cease to be owner or incumbrancer before the sale or all the sales which might be made or completed under such notice or act shall be made and completed, the person who, after the death or determination of the ownership of the owner who shall have published such notice or done such act, shall for the time being be owner of the land or lease, or the executors or administrators or persons who, after the death or determination of the interest of the incumbrancer who shall have published such notice or done such act, shall for the time being be incumbrancer in respect of the same incumbrance, shall be entitled to proceed to the completion of the sale or sales which might have been made and completed by the owner or incumbrancer by whom such notice or other act shall have been published or done, in case he had been living, and had not ceased to be owner or incumbrancer, and so on every successive death or determination of ownership or interest: provided always, that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, with such advice and consent as herein-before mentioned, may from time to time make such rules and orders as shall appear necessary for the protection of infants and absent parties.

46. That the money which shall be paid into the bank of Ireland on any sale without the order of the court shall be paid and applied in payment of the incumbrances which affected the land or lease from the sale of which such purchase money shall have arisen, according to the rights of the persons interested in such land or lease; provided that unless any other person or persons shall, upon application by petition, or otherwise, show better right thereto, the persons who may be entitled to the incumbrances, and the persons otherwise interested, according to the statements in the notice and affidavit given and filed on such sale as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be the persons interested in such land or lease; and the court, upon the order for payment out of court of any such money as aforesaid, may make such conditions for the delivery by the person to whom such payment may be made of any title deeds, or for the execution of any release of any other land or lease on such other conditions as the court may think fit and direct.

47. That as respects as well sales under the order of the court as sales without the order of the court, and the application of the purchase money arising therefrom respectively, the receipt of the accountant-general, or of such other person as the court shall appoint to receive any monies paid under this act, shall be a sufficient discharge for the same, or for so much thereof as shall in such receipt be expressed to be received.

48. That in any case where it shall appear that there are more incumbrances than one affecting any land or lease which shall have been sold or contracted to be sold, or shall be desired to be sold, whether with or without the order of the court, and any doubt shall exist as to the order and priority of such incumbrances, and in any case in which the court shall consider an issue or a suit or action expedient for ascertaining or determining the rights of parties in the land or lease or incumbrance, the court may at any time, either before or after any sale under this act, direct proceedings to be instituted at law or in equity for the purpose of ascertaining the same, and to make any rules or directions relative to such matters as it shall see fit.

49. That the surplus of the purchase money received on any sale, whether under the order of the court or without the order of the court, after the discharge of all incumbrances, shall be laid out, under the direction of the court, in the purchase of other land, which shall be limited and settled to the same uses, upon the same trusts, for the same purposes, and in the same manner as the land sold, or such of them as shall be then subsisting or capable of taking effect; or such monies may, at the discretion of the court, be paid out of court and distributed amongst the parties who shall appear entitled thereto, as the court shall direct; and all such monies may in the meantime be paid over to trustees, to be appointed by the court, or in such manner as it shall direct, for the purpose of such investment thereof and in such manner as shall be directed by the court.

50. That any money so paid into court may by order of the court be invested by the accountant-general of the said court in his name in the purchase of any stocks, funds, or annuities transferable at the bank of Ireland; and until the same shall be sold by order of the court, and after payment of such incumbrances as aforesaid, the dividends thereof shall from time to time be paid to the person who for the time being would have been entitled to the rents of the land to be purchased therewith.

51. That no money which under this act shall be paid into the bank of Ireland to the credit of the accountant-general of the Court of Chancery, or shall be paid out of court, shall be liable to usher's poundage.

52. That whenever the court shall appoint or direct the appointment of any trustee for the purposes of this act the court may make such provision as it shall think fit for the appointment of new trustees on any event to be determined by the court.

53. That where any annual charge, not being an incumbrance within the meaning of this act, shall affect any land or lease to be sold under the provisions of this act, being part of an estate affected by such annual charge, the person entitled to such charge, with the approbation of the court, and with the consent of all parties interested in the remaining part of such estate, may release the land or lease from such charge, without impairing or affecting the same charge as to the remaining part of such estate, and the form of such release shall be approved by the master, and may be included in the aforesaid assurance; and if any person so entitled shall be willing to execute such release the master may state such matter in his report.

54. That every person to whom all or any part of the purchase money received on any sale, either with or without the order of the court, shall be so paid out of court, shall and he is hereby declared to be liable to refund and repay the same, or so much thereof as he shall have received, into and amongst the person or persons who shall, upon a suit to be instituted for that purpose, prove to the satisfaction of the court that he or they had at the time of such sale a better title to the land or lease so sold, and in respect whereof such purchase money was received, than the person or persons to or amongst whom such purchase money shall have been so paid out and distributed; and every such repayment shall be made to such persons, and at such time, and in such proportions, manner, and form respectively, as the court shall direct: provided always, that the court, where from any uncertainty of title or otherwise it shall appear proper so to do, before or upon the payment out of court of any such purchase money may require and take from any person to whom or for whose benefit the same or any part thereof shall be so paid out of court such security for the repayment of such money as to the court in the discretion shall seem fit.

55. That where a sale shall have been made without order of the court of any land or lease, and such sale shall not have been made bona fide for the discharge of incumbrances, the person who shall have so sold, whether he shall or shall not have received all or any part of the purchase money under order of the court, shall be and is hereby declared to be liable to pay or make to any person whose right or interest to or in such land or lease shall have been defeated or prejudicially affected by such sale such compensation as the person so selling would have been liable to pay or make in case the power given by this act had been a trust for the discharge of incumbrances affecting such land or lease, and, subject thereto, a trust for the benefit of the person whose right or interest shall have been so affected and of all other persons interested in such land or lease, and the court, upon suit for that purpose, shall order such compensation to be made, and where any sale shall have been made under this act without order of the court of any land or lease, and any notice required by this act shall have been withheld, or shall have been omitted to be given, or where any such sale shall have been made at an under-value by collusion with the purchaser or his solicitor or agent, then the person who shall have so sold under this act, whether he shall or shall not have received all or any part of the purchase money under the order of the court, and his solicitor or agent, and where such sale shall have been made at an under-value by collusion the purchaser, or his solicitor or agent if such solicitor or agent shall have been cognizant of such collusion, shall jointly and severally be liable to pay or make to any person whose right or interest to or in such land or lease shall have been defeated or prejudicially affected by such sale full compensation, and the court, upon suit for that purpose against all or any of the persons liable under this provision, shall order such compensation to be paid or made accordingly, and the liability of any defendant in any such suit as aforesaid to any pains or penalties for perjury in respect of any statement in any affidavit made under the provision herein contained shall not be allowed in the way of demurrer, plea, or refusal to answer or otherwise to protect such defendant from discovery in respect of the premises: provided always, that the provision for compensation herein contained shall not affect or abridge the right of any person to bring a suit in equity for the recovery of the land or lease on account of fraud against any person who shall have assisted in the commission of such fraud, or shall have taken such land with knowledge of the commission thereof.

56. That no payment towards discharge of what shall be due on any incumbrance, not being payment in full, shall prejudice or affect any right or remedy of the incumbrancer, otherwise than as against the land or lease sold freed and discharged from such incumbrance, unless so far as by the provisions of this act, or by any general rule or order or special rule or order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland or of the court, is or shall be otherwise specially provided.

57. That where any incumbrancer shall be satisfied, by payment out of any monies arising from any sale under this act, and it shall appear that any person, or any land or estate other than the land or lease sold, was liable to such incumbrance or any part thereof, and that any such person or land or estate ought to discharge or contribute towards the discharge of such incumbrance or any part thereof in exoneration of the land or lease sold, the court, may order that any proceedings shall or may be instituted by such person, on such terms and in such manner as the court shall think fit, for recovering the money which ought to be so discharged or contributed in exoneration, and to direct that any such money shall be paid into the bank of Ireland in the name and with the privy and to the credit, or as the court shall direct, to be paid, applied, and dealt with in manner aforesaid, or as the court shall direct.

58. That no payment of or in respect of any incumbrance which shall be made under this act, whether upon or after a sale under order of the court, or upon or after a sale without the order of the court, or which shall be made for facilitating or otherwise in relation to any such sale, shall impair any right or equity of any persons out of whose estate such payment shall be made to be reimbursed or indemnified by any person or out of any other land or estate, except so far as the court under any special circumstances shall order.

59. That where any lease subject to any incumbrance shall be proposed, or shall be ordered to be sold under the provisions of this act, the court, upon the application of any persons claiming to be owners of any estate in reversion in the same land, may direct or authorise and empower the master to include in his report approving a sale, and also to include in the sale, such estate in reversion, upon such terms as the court, or the master under the authority of the court, shall see fit; and in every such case the court, or the master, under the authority of the court, shall apportion the purchase money and the expenses as the court or master shall see fit; and the assurance to be made under this act shall or may include such estate in reversion so sold as aforesaid, if the master shall think fit.

60. That if any land or lease to be sold by order of the court under this act shall be subject to a lease or under-lease for years or lives comprising other land at an entire rent, the master, before proceeding to a sale, may apportion the rent between the land or lease to be sold and the remainder of the land subject to such rent, having first caused notice thereof to be given, as well to the tenant as to the person by whom such entire rent shall be payable, and to the person entitled to receive such entire rent, and any persons claiming an interest in the matter may claim to be heard before the master on the subject of such apportionment: provided no apportionment so made by the master shall be vitiated by any want of notice, or by the absence of any parties, unless the court, on the application of any person complaining of such apportionment, shall otherwise direct; and after such apportionment, and after such sale shall be completed, the owners of the reversion of the respective lands shall have the like remedies for the apportioned rents respectively as were subsisting for the entire rent before such apportionment; and all the covenants, conditions, and agreements of every lease or under-lease, except as to the amount of rent to be paid, shall, as regards the apportioned parts, remain in force in the same manner as they would have done in case no such apportionment had taken place.

61. That no person entitled to any incumbrance shall be bound to accept payment until such incumbrance shall be payable, or to accept at any time less than the full amount due thereon; and no person so entitled, who, according to the practice of the court or the rules of equity, shall be entitled to six months notice of payment, shall be bound to accept payment of his incumbrance without six months notice; but when such notice shall have been given no fresh notice shall be necessary if the money shall be paid within three months after the day fixed, nor shall any incumbrance, being a re-purchaseable annuity, be re-purchased until the time for re-purchase thereof shall have arrived; and every notice with respect to any incumbrance may be given in such form, and by and in the name of such person, and to such person, as the master or the court shall direct; and every such notice shall be binding and effectual to all intents and purposes.

62. That where any incumbrance included in an order for sale, or affecting any land or lease which shall be sold without the order of the court under this act, shall, for want of any notice or otherwise, not be payable, or where parties entitled to an incumbrance cannot be ascertained, or have not come in and claimed to be paid, the court may order such sum as it shall think fit to be set apart, and carried by the accountant-general to such credit, and to be applied as the court shall direct, in order to provide for any such incumbrance, and for costs and expenses relating thereto.

63. That pending any proceedings for a sale by order of the court, the court, on the application of any party interested as owner or incumbrancer, may appoint a receiver of any land or lease, which shall have been contracted or shall be desired to be sold, or any part thereof, and also to discharge such receiver at any time; and that every such receiver shall have all the same powers and authorities and be subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and to all subsisting rules and orders of the court for the regulation of receivers, in like manner, and as fully as any receiver appointed in a cause pending in the court is so subject; and that every such receiver shall account before the master, and shall pay his balance into the Bank of Ireland, in the name, and with the privy, and to the credit aforesaid, to be paid, applied, and dealt with as the court shall direct: provided, that nothing in this act contained, shall empower the court to appoint such receiver at the instance of an incumbrancer who would not, if this this act had not passed, be entitled to apply for the appointment of a receiver over such land or lease.

64. That in every case, in which the guardian of an infant would be authorised to do any act, or give any consent under this act, on behalf of such infant, if such infant shall have no guardian, the court under this act, may appoint a guardian of such infant for the purpose of any proceedings under this act, and also to change such guardian from time to time.

65. That where any person, the committee of whose estate if he were idiot or lunatic, would be authorised to do any act or give any consent as aforesaid, on his behalf, shall be of unsound mind, or incapable of managing his affairs, but shall not have been found idiot or lunatic under an inquisition, or there shall be no committee of the estate, the court, on the application of any person on behalf, or as next friend of such person, or on the application of any person interested in any proceedings pending under this act, may appoint a guardian of such person, for the purpose of any such proceedings under this act, and also at any time, and from time to time to change such guardian.

66. That the costs and expenses of, and incident to every application for the appointment and change of any guardian under this act, shall be in the discretion of the court, and shall and may, if the court think fit, be introduced amongst the costs to be provided for under the general provisions of this act.

or. That this act shall not authorize, nor be taken to authorize the presenting of any petition for sale by order of the court, in any case where an incumbrancer shall be in possession of the land subject to his incumbrance, unless with his consent, nor in any case where the first mortgagee shall have under his security a power of sale which has arisen and may be exercised, unless he shall make, or consent to the application, or shall, after being requested by the petitioner so to do, have refused, or for three months, have neglected, in the opinion of the court, to use diligence towards the exercise of such power of sale, nor in any case where, at the time of presenting such petition, any suit for foreclosure, or redemption, or sale of the incumbered land, which shall have been commenced before the first day of July one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight shall be pending, unless with the consent of the parties competent to consent to the dismissal or staying of the suit, and that every such consent shall be stated in the petition for confirming and carrying into effect a contract for sale as aforesaid; and that in case of such suit the court, may give directions to any parties for discontinuing or staying such suit, and respecting the costs thereof, or otherwise, and that pending any proceedings for a sale by order of the court under this act any owner or person claiming to be owner within the provisions of this act, or claiming by the act of such owner or person, or by act of law, pending any proceedings under this act, or any incumbrancer, may commence any proceedings at law or in equity for redemption, foreclosure, or sale, without the leave of the court, to be given under this act; and that in every case the court shall have full power to make or grant any order or injunction for staying any proceedings contrary to the provisions of this act, and for costs relative thereto: provided always, that this act shall not authorize any sale or assignment of a lease contrary to the covenants and conditions of such lease.

68. That when any petition shall be presented for confirming and carrying into effect a contract for sale or for a sale under this act of any land or lease in respect of which any suit for foreclosure or redemption or sale shall have been pending, and shall be discontinued or stayed under this act, the court may order that all such proofs and debts and other proceedings, and such evidence as shall have been taken in the suit, may be adopted and used in the proceedings under such petition, in the same manner as if the same had been originally taken under the reference upon such petition.

DUBLIN, MARCH 3, 1849.

THE case of the Queen v. Charles Gavan Duffy has been so protracted, so often before the public at distinct intervals of time, the points raised have been so numerous, and the law of criminal pleading so thoroughly sifted, that we think a succinct history of this extraordinary case may prove acceptable to our readers.

The proceedings have already been before four Commissions of Oyer and Terminer, four bills of indictment have been found, and the prisoner has been placed at the bar nearly forty different days. The questions of law discussed prior to the last Commission, will be found reported ante, p. 81. We purpose to continue our report of the subsequent proceedings almost immediately. In anticipation, however, of it, and as a resumé of the whole case, we now intend to give a brief narrative of the points of law raised and ruled at this prosecution, unprecedented in the annals of criminal law, and which, judging from the past, is yet far from being terminated.

The prisoner was committed on the 8th of July, 1848, and on the 8th of August following, a bill of indictment, for feloniously publishing, in the county of the city of Dublin, certain printings in the Nation newspaper, was preferred to, and found by the grand jury of the county of the city. The indictment was framed under the recent statute, 11 & 12 Vic. c. 12. The prisoner was not tried on this indictment—the trial being postponed by the crown, in consequence of the then recently discovered letter of the prisoner to W. S. O'Brien.

At the October Commission next following, a bill of the same nature was found by the grand jury of the county of Dublin, the venue being changed, under the provisions of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 51, by the crown, in order to avoid the question which had been raised in the Queen v. Martin, as to the interest of a burgess. The prisoner having been brought to the bar for arraignment, his counsel objected that this could not be done while he was in the custody of the sheriff of the city, and that the writs of habeas corpus sued out for the purpose of removal, could not be acted on, not having been issued ten days previous to the holding of the Commission for the county. The objection was ruled in the prisoner's favour. The case of the Queen v. Martin having, in the interim, been decided in favour of the crown, at the ensuing commission, in December, for the county of the city, the prisoner was, for the third time, indicted; and, the bills being found, it was moved on his behalf, that this indictment should be quashed, for this reason—that the venue of the indictment had been changed from the county to the city, and that under the provisions of the 9th section of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 51, it was enacted, "that after the delivery of the said notices, it shall not be lawful for any person to prefer any bill of indictment to any sessions of Oyer and Terminer, for any such county of a city." In fact, that the crown could not return again to the city, having once elected to proceed in the county; and that this migratory warfare was forbidden by the statute. To this it was answered by the crown, that the notices required to be served, by the 8th section, on persons who had entered into recognizances, and, by the 9th section, on the persons before whom the recognizances had been entered into, respectively to attend at, and to return the recognizance to the adjoining county, not having been given—that the clause of the 9th section relied upon by the prisoner did not apply. And this view of the case was adopted by the court.

Three questions were raised, independently of that on which the court decided. First, whether the crown was within the letter of the act, the word "prosecutor," in the enabling parts of the statute, being large enough to include the Attorney-

General prosecuting for the Queen; and the word "person," in the disabling clause of the 9th section and in the 13th section being, it was contended, insufficient for that purpose. On this, the opinion of the court appears to have been, that the crown was within the enabling, and would not be bound by the disabling parts. Perrin, J. (Ir. Jur. p. 85), says, "Before the passing of this statute, it was not illegal to have a second bill found during the pendency of the first, and it would be difficult to hold, that where there is no express provision in the act, we should imply one restraining the crown from sending up a second bill in the place where the offence was committed." And Richards, B. (p. 86 of the same report), speaking of the 13th section, and of the use of the word "person," says, "That section was plainly intended to apply to private prosecutors only, but it would be too much to hold from that, that none of the preceding enabling sections of the act includes the crown."

Secondly, it was argued, that though the crown was not included within the letter of the act, yet, having taken advantage of it, it became bound by all its provisions. On this branch of the case, the court does not appear to have come to any final determination, their opinion (as we understand it) being, that the crown could scarcely be said to have taken advantage of the provisions of the act; that no notices having been served, the election to proceed in the new venue was not complete. The inclination of the mind of the court was apparently that the crown should not be bound; and the case of the Attorney-General v. Wilson (Jebb, C. C., Reserved, 313) would appear to support this view.

Thirdly, whether the Attorney-General could in any case be bound by the restrictive provisions of the 9th section; and on this question the court were of opinion that, as there were no express words to bind the crown, they were not to be implied. But Richards, B., at p. 87, says, "Supposing the 9th section to bear the construction contended for, on the part of the defendant, in regard to cases coming plainly within its operation, it may, I apprehend, admit of some question—I will say, of a very grave and serious question—whether the court would not feel itself authorised to apply the principle to be extracted from such a provision as that to crown prosecutions. I mean prosecutions carried on by the Attorney-General, as well as to all other cases where the Attorney-General had availed himself of the general provisions of the statute." He then subsequently guards himself from being considered to have expressed an opinion one way or the other.

These points, after much discussion and delay, having been disposed of, the prisoner, being called upon to answer the indictment, pleaded in abatement that two of the grand jurors who found the bills were not either inhabitants of the city, or resident therein, or freemen thereof, or burgesses, or seized or possessed of, or entitled to, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments within the city for any estate of freehold or less estate, or liable to be rated for municipal and other taxes. The court held that it was not necessary for grand jurors to be freeholders, Anonymous, (Russell & Ry. C. C. 177,) that it was sufficient if they were good and lawful men of the place, probi et legales homines, which they might well be, and yet not residents, R. v. Adland, (4 B. & C. 772). And, that consistently with the averments in the plea, the jurors might be principal merchants of the city, directors or shareholders in a bank, qualifications which would entitle them to act as grand jurors of the city, though non-resident. Perrin, J., was of opinion that the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 91, was applicable to grand jurors at the Commission of Oyer and Terminer, as well as to juries for the trial of issues, and grand juries at sessions, to which it had been contended the act only applied. That this act consolidated the law, respecting jurors, as it previously existed, and that as the plea did not negative the qualifications given by this act it was bad.

Still fertile in points, the counsel for the prisoner demurred to the indictment.

We are not aware of any case in which the law of criminal pleading has received such consideration, at least no case of felony. This has arisen principally from the serious doubts which existed, whether the prosecutor could, in the event of judgment being in his favour, demand final judgment, and the consequent dislike of those entrusted with a prisoner's defence to incur the responsibility, and run the hazard, of risking the liberty, perhaps the life, of their client on the result of a point of law. The course taken was a bold one, but perfectly justifiable, this being a case arising on a new statute.

The arguments and judgments will well repay the lawyer's perusal, and will be found useful for civil as well as criminal pleading, involving a nice consideration of the doctrine of innuendos or explanatory averments, as applicable to the law of libel or slander.

The indictment preferred at the December Commission contained six counts. The first and third set out the portions of the publication relied upon by the crown, and in the first count charged the prisoner with the publication of certain articles with the intent to "depose the Queen," and in the third count with the intent "to levy war." Three objections were taken to these counts, first, that the writings, by which the prisoner was alleged to have expressed his intention, were not set out with sufficient certainty; secondly, that they severally charged distinct felonies in the same indictment in a manner not allowed by law, and thirdly, that the printings and writings were not accompanied with the averments or innuendos necessary to affix to them the stamp of illegality necessary to bring them within the act.

All these objections the court overruled.

The second and fourth counts set out the same printings and writings as the first and third, but stated them in the second count to be distinct overt acts evidencing the intention to depose the Queen, and in the fourth count as evidencing the intention to levy war.

To these counts, the objections made to the first and third were also raised, and, in addition, it was objected that they were repugnant and inconsistent, and that the publications were improperly laid as overt acts.

The court decided that these counts were bad for repugnancy as to all but the first overt act, inasmuch as the first overt act being stated as evidencing an intention to do an act on the 3d of June, a subsequent overt act on the 17th could not be said to evidence the same intention as that on the 3d. To express the same idea in untechnical language, and by an illustration—it would be inconsistent and repugnant to state that the prisoner raised his arm on the 3d of June with the intention of striking the Queen, and on the 17th again raised his arm to strike her on the 3rd. There was but one felony charged, and it was impossible that a subsequent overt act could be said to relate back to that which had been charged to have been previously committed, and on the same ground the court rejected every overt act subsequent to that laid on the 3d of June. They, however, decided that publications might properly be laid as overt acts.

The fifth and sixth counts were general, not setting out any of the printings or writings charged in the previous counts, merely stating in the former that the prisoner on the several days therein mentioned expressed his intention to depose the Queen by divers overt acts of publication, and in the latter count expressed his intention, by the same means, to levy war against her. These counts were objected to for not setting out the contents of the overt acts, and that they were also bad for repugnancy. On the first objection the court decided that the contents of the publications charged as overt acts need not be stated, but that the same arguments, on the question of repugnancy, which applied to the second and fourth counts, applied to these likewise, that is, that the demurrer should be allowed as to all the overt acts except the first.

Although this part of the demurrer was allowed, yet it will be observed that it only applied to part of the counts, therefore all the first and third counts were good, so, likewise, were the first overt acts laid in the second, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts. The advantage supposed to have been gained by the prisoner was this, that in the last mentioned counts no evidence of overt acts could be given subsequently to the 3d of June; but this advantage appears to us not a very substantial one, as all the publications could be given in evidence under the counts that remained untouched.

At the termination of the judgment on the demurrer, the Attorney-General asked for final judgment; but the court said, that was a question of much difficulty, one upon which they did not then wish to give any opinion, and suggested three courses which might be adopted to bring the question before the court above. First, to reserve a case for the opinion of the twelve judges, as had been the practice before the passing of the 11 & 12 Vic. c. 78. Secondly, to reserve a case for the opinion of the Court of Criminal appeal, under the provisions of that statute; and, thirdly, for the Attorney-General to remove the proceedings by certiorari.

The Attorney-General, on a subsequent day, declined to adopt any of the courses suggested, and pressed for final judgment. The court directed the case, on this point, to be further argued, and, finally, gave judgment of respondet ouster in favour of the prisoner.

These various proceedings were not terminated until after the first day of Hilary Term, when the judges declined then to try the case, and adjourned it to the next Commission of Oyer and Terminer.

At the ensuing Commission in February, the Attorney-General preferred an entirely new bill of indictment to the city grand jury, which being found, the prisoner on the 7th of that month was brought to the bar to answer the matter of the last indictment. The prisoner's counsel moved that the court should direct that no proceeding be taken on this indictment until the prisoner be tried on the former one, or it should be otherwise disposed of. This application the court refused.

Then the prisoner pleaded in abatement, that one of the grand jurors who found the bill resided at a place outside the city boundary, as it existed before the passing of the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 109, but within the borough as defined by that act, and it was contended, first, that the city boundaries were not altered for the purposes of the Court of Commission, the terms of the act being applicable to borough courts alone, which it was argued that court was not; and secondly, that as the Court of Commission sat by virtue of a commission of the 1st of Vic., that the jurisdiction of the court must be taken to be co-extensive with the limits as they existed at that time. The court were of opinion that even if their own opinion had been otherwise, that they could not set it in opposition to the solemn judgment of the superior courts, in the cases of the Queen v. the Inhabitants of St. George, (8 Ir. Law Rep. 23); Lessee Barber v. Evans, (10 Ir. L. Rep. 480); and that the second point was not open for argument on the record.

On Saturday, February the 10th, the plea in abatement being overruled, the prisoner demurred to the indictment.

The indictment contained four counts. The first two set out the printings and writings as publications, and charged that the prisoner did, on the 3d of June, publish certain printings, stating the intent in the first count to be "to depose," and in the second to "levy war," and that he did on the 17th of June further express the same compassing by publications on that day, and so on the several subsequent days of publication. The third and fourth counts were general, not setting out the publications, and charged them as overt acts, that the prisoner did on the 3d day of June intend to depose, and that intention he expressed on the said 3d of June, by divers overt acts and deeds, and, in order to fulfil that intention, he published on the 3d of June, and further to fulfil, &c. he published on the 17th of June, and so through the subsequent days of publication. The fourth count was similar, except that the intention averred was to levy war.

The objections raised on the argument of the demurrer were, that all the counts were uncertain, double, and repugnant; and to the third and fourth counts it was further objected, first, that there was no distinct statement of any overt act, and that a publication was not an overt act within the meaning of the treason-felony statute. Secondly, that the third overt act, in each count was averred to be a printing and not a publication; and, lastly, in neither of these counts was there any averment of a contemplated rebellion or treasonable design. The court overruled the demurrer. This indictment, it will be observed, was not open to the objection for repugnancy that had been made successfully to the preceding one.

The prisoner pleaded, Not Guilty, and a jury being about to be sworn, he, through his counsel, challenged the array, and shewed for cause that the panel had been arrayed unfavourably to the prisoner. That the majority of the jurors of the city of Dublin were Roman Catholics, whereas the jury panel as returned, consisted of a large preponderance of Protestants, and he offered evidence to the triers appointed to try the challenge, of the religion of the jurors, which the court held to be inadmissible. The triers found against the challenge. The prisoner then challenged every juror whose age exceeded sixty, or who resided in the county, having only a place of business within the city.

The jury sworn to try the issue having disagreed, were finally discharged, leaving this case, already so unprecedented in length, to be brought under the consideration of another jury.

THE open expression by the Premier, a few days since, of his conviction that the law of settlement had worked badly in England, and that any law impeding the circulation of labour would be attended with very injurious consequences to Ireland, led us to hope, that the necessity of such an enactment would not have been involved in the proposition he was about to submit to the Committee of Inquiry into the Irish Poor Law—a proposition for the relief of Irish pauperism.

The plan he has proposed, however, exhibits no indication that any such conviction existed in the mind of its framer; it is based on the principle that, to 25 per cent. on the valuation, property should support its poverty—that when this limit has been reached, the neighbourhood shall be taxed in aid, to 10 per cent., and that when these united supplies have been exhausted—and not till then—a national rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. shall be resorted to. Other subsidiary provisions are suggested,—one exonerating any increase in the value of property resulting from expenditure of capital, from liability to poor rate, for from seven to ten years; and another exonerating lands which have lain waste for a year from arrears of poor rate. It is compounded of the two rival systems,—based on limited and extended areas of taxation,—and is open to many of the objections to which these systems are exposed, besides to others, and serious ones, peculiarly its own. It has, however, some advantages to recommend it, and which we shall proceed, in the first place, to consider.

The most important of these consists in fixing the maximum to which taxation can reach. This will do much to remove the present objection entertained by substantial parties to undertake the cultivation of land in the distressed districts; it will enable landlords to calculate what rent they should demand, and tenants what rent they could afford to pay for land; though in future lettings—at least, in the poorer parts of Ireland—it will probably have the effect of throwing the whole weight of the poor rate—and that at its maximum—on the proprietor, as farmers will naturally take this maximum rate into consideration when proposing for land, and calculate on paying only the difference between the letting value and this maximum; and landlords are not now—and probably will not be for some time—in a position to contest the point with solvent bona fide bidders. We do not object to the limit at which the tax is fixed; and we think that if by sacrificing, even permanently, one-fourth of their incomes, proprietors could save the other three-fourths, they should, under present circumstances, be very well satisfied indeed.

The suggestion to exonerate improvements on land, during seven or ten years, from taxation for poor rate, is also a very valuable one; outlay will be encouraged, and thus the quantity of employment given be increased; and this, in our opinion, is a much more rational method of restoring the country, than by endeavouring to force men, by legislation, to do what a regard for their own interests should compel them.

Clearly, however, as we see these beneficial tendencies of the plan, and highly as we value the importance of the suggestions noticed above, we cannot shut our eyes to the disadvantages under which it labours, or which will follow from it, as necessary consequences.

The most important of these consequences we apprehend to be a law of settlement for paupers. It is quite evident that this must be a necessary consequence; for the only advantage expected to follow from the part of the plan which limits the area of taxation, is, that proprietors will undertake the profitable employment of their poor, when they will have these only to maintain, and their protection must consist in keeping the paupers from other divisions within their own divisions. If paupers were allowed to wander from one division to another, then the proprietor who gave most employment would attract most paupers, and the proprietor would be best off who exerted himself least. If there is any benefit to be derived from this part of the plan, it will be by individualising responsibility; and this must lead to a law of settlement, with all its pernicious consequences.

A second objection consists in taxing, for the benefit of the county generally, those very classes which have suffered most and are least able to bear the pressure.

The failure of the staple article of food,—that great calamity which has fallen on this country,—is the great cause of Ireland's present distress. By this calamity the small holders of land, who occupy the great extent, especially of the poor districts, have been either extinguished altogether, or reduced to the brink of ruin. Their landlords rank next in the scale of suffering, whilst mortgagees and other incumbrancers, and owners of property, not connected with land, have, comparatively speaking, not suffered at all. Those three classes represent the whole property of the country. It is admitted on all sides that circumstances call for measures very different from those hitherto adopted. The country is sinking, and some great and combined effort must be made to rescue it. Who, then, are called on to make this effort? The owners of property, which has not suffered from the universal and repeated failure of the national food? They, whose resources are unimpaired, and whose energies are unexhausted? By no means. The struggling, the almost ruined occupier of a few acres of land, the landlord whose incumbrances remain to their full amount, but whose means of meeting his engagement are cut off by the ruin of the small farmers; who, in some instances, are in a prison, and in many others are with difficulty keeping without its walls. These are the parties who are called upon to make this exertion—these are they, on whom the government plan casts the onus of supporting a sinking country; and yet these two classes, who are thus about to be crushed under this enormous and disproportionate weight, are the sole manufacturers of our wealth—the sole hope of our prosperity—the moving power, without which the machine of society would soon cease to work. The law imposing an income-tax in England provides that, persons possessing property of less than £150 a year—which in Ireland would be considered a respectable income—shall be protected from its operation; while in Ireland an almost diametrically opposite rule is adopted, and only those who are in reality least able to pay, are taxed for the benefit of the whole country.

The two first objections we mentioned before; the third has the merit of being peculiarly the consequence of the plan of the Premier. It follows from that part of it, which proposes, that property which has lain waste for a year, shall be exonerated from the arrears of poor rate. Here is a most convenient loop hole contrived for the escape of idle or indolent proprietors, and one which, if passed into law, we have no doubt will be taken advantage of. Properties in the distressed parts of Ireland are at this moment, to a great extent, waste; any substantial tenants who survived the horrors of 1846 and 1847 having gone away on the re-appearance of the blight in 1848—for these waste tracts, whenever the former tenants were valued at under £4 annually in the rate books—the proprietors have been held liable, and have been in many instances compelled to pay poor rates. What will be their conduct under the altered circumstances of their position? Will they raise or borrow money, and by employing the paupers endeavour to render these waste tracts productive? Not at all; for then they would cease to be waste tracts, and the proprietors would be liable to poor rate for them. What, then, will be their course? They will not only not cultivate, or attempt to cultivate these waste lands, but will render waste every acre, to the rate on which they would otherwise be liable. They will argue, that it will be better that their properties should be unproductive, than that they should be ruined by, perhaps, a fruitless exertion to provide employment for their resident poor, from any contribution to whose support they will be exonerated by merely letting their lands lie waste; that they will lie by till the storm blows over, either by the starving down of the population, or by some other means; that—the law providing that these waste lands should be free from arrears of poor rate—the very best position in which they could hold untenanted lands would be in a waste state, as thus they would be in a condition to be let immediately to any tenant who might offer, and which, in the meantime, would be no incumbrance. Here, then, we have a direct premium on idleness—an idleness, too, to be indulged in, at the expense of the neighbouring divisions, or at the expense of the country generally. In another particular, likewise, this plan seems by no means satisfactory. It is proposed that no rate in aid shall be called for by any electoral division, till 5s. in the £1 is first collected on itself. Now suppose—and the hypothesis is not an extravagant one—that some divisions will not be able to pay this 5s. in the £1, will the rate in aid be refused in that instance? Or suppose further, that the union cannot pay 5s. in the £1, will the national rate of 6d. in the £1 be refused? Perhaps Lord John intends to pursue the course he proposes to adopt in the commencement, namely, levying the national rate first, and calling for the others as they may be found wanting. And, indeed, some such intention as this is apparently shadowed out in his proposal of exonerating waste lands from arrears of poor rate.

Much reliance is placed on the new arrangement to be founded on the report of Commissioners for "Inquiry into the number and boundaries of Poor Law Unions and Electoral Divisions in Ireland." In their report, however, after pointing out the object they have sought to obtain, viz., the "placing the country, and each part of it, in a position which shall best combine the interest of the labouring class with that of the employers of labour," and that it "was to be found in such a change of boundary, and, in many cases, in such a reduction of area of the present electoral divisions, as shall give every practicable advantage to the zealous improver, without unduly restricting the field of the labourer's employment," the Commissioners have, after all the attention they have been able to bestow on the subject, and the peculiar means of information which they possessed, only been able to report that they "hoped to find it practicable to have in each district such an amount of labour as was necessary for its improvement, having regard to the peculiar capabilities it might possess, without making the divisions so large as to prevent the influence of each proprietor and occupier from being usefully exerted, as well by the force of example, with its valuable operation on public opinion, as by the more direct means of labour afforded; and this we had every reason to suppose could be accomplished with such regard to the boundaries of property, as at least to prevent any part of an estate from being severed from the other parts, unless they were outlying or detached."

That these hopes must have been disappointed in very many cases, is the necessary result of the manner in which the property of one proprietor is found scattered in small portions over very wide districts in many parts of the country. We know one district in the Ballina union which hitherto was comprised in two electoral divisions, and which the Commissioners propose to re-arrange into thirteen; and, minute as are these subdivisions, and anxious as the Commissioners were to "prevent any part of an estate from being severed from the other parts," one proprietor has property in twelve out of these thirteen divisions, and among the thirteen divisions there is not one which does not embrace the properties of five, or six, or more, different proprietors. In fact there is no arrangement, save that of throwing the same property, though scattered over a wide space, into one electoral division for itself—and which the Commissioners regard as impracticable—by which this property, or the other properties in these divisions, could be more satisfactorily condensed.

In fine, the plan has the merit of pleasing nobody, though it apparently was intended to please all. For ourselves, we confidently expect that Lord John's sixpenny national rate will rapidly increase, and, as Aaron's rod swallowed up the rods of the Egyptian magicians, so that it will swallow up in the end the union rate and the electoral rate, leaving no trace of that part of his plan based on individualizing responsibility, but the pernicious consequences of the law of settlement.

69. That when any petition for confirming and carrying into execution a contract for sale or for a sale shall have been presented without the requisite consent, such consent may by leave of the court be given subsequently, so as to render valid the proceedings under such petition; and that where any such petition shall be invalid for want of such consent the court may make such order against the person who shall have presented the same relative to the costs of any other person of any proceedings had under such petition as the court shall think fit.

70. That any incumbrancer not being the first incumbrancer on any land or on any lease of land in Ireland, who shall be desirous of exercising the powers given to a first incumbrancer under this act, and for that purpose shall be willing to redeem the prior incumbrances, or all the prior incumbrances if more than one, may apply by petition in a summary way to the court for liberty so to redeem such prior incumbrance or incumbrances; and the court, upon such petition, may make such order and give such directions in all respects as might have been made or given in a suit by such petitioning incumbrancer for redemption of such prior incumbrance or incumbrances; and in case the amount which shall be owing to any incumbrancer whose incumbrance shall be sought to be redeemed shall not be admitted or agreed upon, the court, upon payment into court by the petitioner of the money due on such incumbrance, may order that the petitioner shall, for the purposes of all proceedings in court under this act, and for the purposes of sales without the order of the court under this act, stand in the place of the owner of such incumbrance, without prejudice to the rights of the petitioner and of the incumbrancer whom he shall seek to redeem, upon taking the account of the incumbrance: provided, that it shall not be lawful upon any such petition to question the validity or title of any such prior incumbrance.

71. That no petition shall be presented for confirming and carrying into execution a contract for sale or for a sale by order of the court under this act by any assignee of any bankrupt or insolvent debtor, without the consent thereto of the major part in number and value of the creditors assembled at a meeting duly convened for that purpose first had and obtained: provided that where any such petition shall have been presented without such consent having been first had and obtained, such consent may by leave of the court be given subsequently, so as to render valid the proceedings under such petition.

72. And whereas doubts are entertained whether, when a judgment affects lands in Ireland, and when the person entitled to such judgment is willing to release a portion of such lands in order to the sale thereof, or otherwise, he can grant such release without nullifying the effect or validity of such judgment upon the residue thereof, or any other property which it is intended should remain subject to such judgment: and whereas it is expedient that such doubts be removed: be it enacted, that the release of any portion of lands in Ireland from any judgment shall not operate or be construed to extend or operate so as to nullify or in any manner to affect the validity and force of such judgment as regards the residue of such lands, or any other property not specially released from such judgment, but that such judgment shall continue to affect such residue or other property, notwithstanding such release, in like manner, and with the like powers to enforce payment of interest and principal, and to all intents and purposes, as if such deed of release had not been executed.

73. That in the month of February in every year, or if parliament be not sitting, then within fourteen days after the next meeting of parliament, a return shall be laid before both houses of parliament, showing the total amount or quantity in statute acres of all lands sold under the provisions of this act during the year ending the thirty-first day of December then last past, together with a statement of the total annual rent of such lands (so far as the same shall have been shown in the proceedings,) the total amount of incumbrances which affected such lands at the time of the application for the sale thereof respectively under this act, the total amount of purchase money for the same, together with the total amount of all such law costs incurred as shall have been paid out of such purchase money, and of all other charges and expenses which may have been paid or deducted from the proceeds of such sales under the order of the court.

74. That in citing this act in other acts, and in legal instruments, it shall be sufficient to use the expression "The Irish Incumbered Estates Act."

75. That this act shall, except so far as the special provisions of the same otherwise require, extend only to Ireland, and may be amended, altered, or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

CAP. XLIX.

An Act for regulating the sale of beer and other liquors on the Lord's day.
[14th August, 1848.]

CAP. L.

An Act to empower the Commissioners of Her Majesty's woods to remove the colonnade in the Regent's Quadrant.
[14th August, 1848.]

CAP. LI.

An Act to provide additional funds for loans for drainage and other works of public utility in Ireland.
[14th August, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Treasury may cause to be issued a further sum not exceeding 945,000*l.* to the commissioners of public works in Ireland. Sums issued not to exceed the sum actually paid into the Exchequer under provisions of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 1. 107. and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 87.

2. Sums issued to be applied for loans for completion of public works commenced under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 11 107., and for promotion of drainage and other works of public utility.

3. Powers, &c. of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 106, to extend to this act.

4. Power to treasury to postpone commencement of payment of annuities under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 67.

5. Power to treasury to convert annuities into others of longer or shorter duration of equal value.

6. If Grand Jury shall not make application at Summer Assizes for conversion of annuities, clerk of the peace may call special sessions, at which justices may make application.

7. Provision where occupation of premises may be changed.

8. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas an act was passed in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 85, and whereas another act was passed in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 108, and whereas an act was passed in the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 106, and whereas under the authority of an act of the 7 W. 4, & 1 Vict. c. 21, and of an act passed in the said session of parliament holden in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 1, and also of another act passed in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 107, and of an act of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 10, sundry advances were made by the commissioners of public works in Ireland for the purpose of affording relief by means of employment on public works: and whereas, under the conditions on which these advances were made, and under the provisions of an act of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 87, one moiety of the advances made under the two last-recited acts, with interest, was made re-payable by half-yearly instalments: and whereas by various presentments made at the Spring and Summer Assizes 1847, and at the Spring or Summer Assizes 1848, in different counties in Ireland, several sums are payable into the Exchequer in respect of the advances herein-before mentioned, and whereas certain of the works commenced under the two lastly above-recited acts of the ninth and tenth years of Her Majesty are unfinished: and whereas it is expedient to complete the same, and also to carry on works of river drainage under the act passed 9 & 10 Vict. c. 4, and the other acts recited therein, and also of carrying on other works in Ireland: be it enacted, that the commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, may cause to be issued from time to time as they may find necessary during the three years next ensuing the 5th of April, 1848, out of the consolidated fund, any sum or sums of money not exceeding the sum of £945,000, to be placed to the credit of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt: provided that the total sum issued from the consolidated fund under this act shall not exceed the sum paid into the Exchequer under the act of the 1 Vict. c. 21, the act of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 107, the said act of the same years "to facilitate the employment of the labouring poor for a limited period in the distressed districts in Ireland," and the said act of the last session of parliament "to facilitate the recovery of public monies advanced for the relief of distress in Ireland by the employment of the labouring poor."

2. That all the monies placed to the credit of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt shall be held subject to the disposal of the commissioners of public works in Ireland, for the purposes of any loans which the said commissioners may think fit to make for the completion of public works commenced under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 1, 107, and for the extension and promotion of drainage, and for any other works in respect of which, under any of the acts herein-before mentioned, or any other acts, loans are authorized to be made by the said commissioners of public works in Ireland out of the funds provided by parliament for that purpose, and for the purposes of any other loans which the said commissioners of public works in Ireland may, by any act or acts hereafter to be passed, be authorized to make for the execution of works of public utility in Ireland.

3. That all the powers, of what nature or kind soever, contained in the firstly herein-recited act of the last session of parliament, and the acts recited therein, and in any act authorizing loans to be made for the extension and promotion of drainage and other works of utility in Ireland, shall extend to this act, and to the loans hereby authorized to be made.

4. And whereas by the said act of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 106, it is provided, that the sums chargeable under the said act on the several baronies, &c., with interest up to the first day of March, 1848, shall be ascertained by the commissioners of public works in Ireland, and for every £100, there shall be paid an annuity of £12, and so on in proportion for any lesser sum during the period of ten years; and such annuity shall be charged upon the barony, half barony, electoral division, part of an electoral division, district, county of a city, county of a town in respect of which the said commissioners shall certify the same to be due; and such an annuity shall be payable by two instalments in each year, one at each successive Assize, or in the case of the county of Dublin at the successive periods limited for the payment of the respective moieties of grand jury cess for such county, until twenty instalments shall have been paid, the first of the same being payable at the Summer Assize, and in the case of the county of Dublin at the period limited for the payment of the first moiety of grand jury cess after the presenting term of the year 1848, and provided that the whole sum may be paid off in one payment in any case where the grand jury shall think fit to make a presentment for that purpose; and it is further provided, that the said commissioners shall issue certificates to the secretaries of the several grand juries of the total sum so to be repaid, and of the annuity by which the repayments are to be made, and that each secretary shall lay such certificate before the grand jury of the county, county of a city, or county of a town to which the same shall relate, at the Spring Assizes, and in the case of the county of Dublin at the presenting term of 1848, each grand jury, without any application to presentment sessions, may present the total sum of principal and interest specified in such certificate: And whereas the said commissioners of public works in Ireland have, previous to or at the Spring or Summer Assizes, and in the case of the county of Dublin to the presenting term of 1848, certified to the secretaries of the grand juries of the several counties, counties of cities, and counties of towns, in Ireland, the total compound sum to be paid in each barony, half barony, electoral division, part of electoral division, district, county of a city and county of a town respectively, and the instalment of annuity which is to be paid for that purpose at the next and every succeeding Assize until twenty such instalments are paid: and whereas it may be expedient to postpone the payment of the said annuity, and by reason of the unequal proportions of the annual payments chargeable on the several counties and divisions of counties it may be expedient that the re-payments should be made in some cases by annuities of longer duration, and in others of shorter duration, than ten years: be it enacted, that the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, may direct the treasurer of any county, or county of a city or county of a town, in Ireland, in which the sum or sums certified by the said commissioners of public works shall have been previously presented, or in case of the county of Dublin the finance committee of the same county, to postpone the payment of the first instalment of each such annuity until the Spring Assizes of 1849, and in the case of the county of Dublin until the presenting term in the year 1849, and thereupon all the provisions of the said last-recited act in relation to the annuity or annuities in such respective county, county of a city or county of a town, shall be construed and take effect as if the first instalment thereof had been made payable at such Spring Assizes and presenting term.

5. That the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, upon application by the grand jury of any county, or county of a city, or county of a town, in Ireland, or by the justices assembled at a Special Sessions to be summoned as hereinafter directed, in which the sum or sums so certified by the said commissioners of public works shall have been presented, to authorize the conversion of the annuity charged on such county, county of a city or county of a town, or the portion of such annuity chargeable on any barony, half barony, electoral division, or district, under the certificate and presentment in this behalf, or into an annuity of a shorter or longer duration in no case exceeding twenty years, provided the value at the time of the conversion shall be equal to the value at the same time of the annuity or portion of annuity charged or chargeable as aforesaid, or such instalments thereof as aforesaid, or portion thereof, such respective values to be calculated on the basis on which such an annuity of twelve pounds for ten years as aforesaid was taken as equal to a sum of one hundred pounds; and all the powers, authorities, or provisions contained in the last-recited act which relate to the presentment, raising, levying, and paying of the annuities to be presented by the grand juries under that act shall extend to the annuities mentioned under this act: provided that with respect to the limitation of the total sum to be issued under this act, all postponed payments, and payments of substituted annuities under the postponement and conversions hereby authorized, shall be deemed payments under the provisions of the last-recited act.

6. That in case such application shall not have been made by the grand jury of any county, &c. at the Summer Assizes of this present year, and it may be expedient that such application should be made previous to any levy, the clerk of the peace of any such county, county of a city, or county of a town, and he is hereby required within two days after the receipt of a written requisition of the treasurer of such county for that purpose, may call a Special Sessions of the Peace to be held on or previous to the first day of October of this present year, to be held at the county or assize town (giving six days notice thereof to the justices of such county) and the justices then and there assembled may make such application as aforesaid.

7. 'And whereas by the said recited act of the last session of Parliament, intituled, An Act to facilitate the Recovery of Public Monies advanced for the Relief of Distress in Ireland by the employment of the labouring Poor, it is amongst other things enacted, that any such sum of money to be from time to time raised and levied off any barony, half barony, electoral division, part of an electoral division, district, county of city or county of a town, as in the said act provided, shall be charged upon, and levied upon, the occupiers of and other persons rateable in respect of lands and hereditaments within such barony, half barony, electoral division, part of an electoral division, district, county of a city or county of a town respectively, and rated under the then last preceding rate or rates made, under the provisions of an act passed in the 1 & 2 Vict. and the several acts amending the same, and shall be payable by the respective rate-payers who under the said last preceding rate or rates shall have paid or contributed or been liable to pay or contribute rate in respect of property in such barony, half barony, electoral division, part of an electoral division, district, county of a city or county of a town; and any such sum of money shall be apportioned, assessed, and levied by the respective high constable or collector of grand jury cess for or in such barony, half barony, or place as aforesaid as a poundage assessment equally upon the net annual value of the several lands and hereditaments within such barony, half barony, electoral division, part of an electoral division, district, or county of a city or county of a town respectively, rated as aforesaid, as such net annual value shall have been stated in such last preceding rate or valuation as aforesaid' and be it enacted, that where any rate-payer or rate-payers shall have ceased to occupy the rateable property, all and every sum and sums of money to be so raised and levied under the said provision of the said act, and all and every sum and sums of money which shall be raised and levied under or in consequence of the postponement of payment and conversions of annuities hereby authorized, or any of them, shall be paid by the person or persons in the actual occupation of the lands and hereditaments on which such sum or sums respectively shall be assessed at the time of the assessment thereof, and in the default of any such person or persons, from the person or persons in the actual occupation of the same lands or hereditaments from whom such sum or sums shall be demanded, subject to such provisions as to deduction from rent as in the said act of the first and second years of the reign of Her present Majesty contained, so far as the same shall be applicable.

8. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

DUBLIN, MARCH 10, 1849.

From the Shannon westward to the Atlantic lie the five counties comprising the province of Connaught—Galway, Leitrim, Mayo, Roscommon, and Sligo, blessed with as fertile a soil, on the average, as perhaps any district of equal size in the United Kingdom, and occupied by a laborious and frugal population. Previously to the blight of the potato in 1845, and the following years, this province yielded a rental of nearly one and a-half million sterling annually; it is now steeped in the most wretched destitution and poverty, and, far from being able to yield this rental, is now scarcely able even to support the population existing on its surface.

However, though this extremity of misery is, no doubt, attributable to the failure of that food on which too exclusive reliance was placed, it must not be forgotten that the distress and degradation of this province is not of recent growth; and its origin must be sought for in sources which were in existence, while the potato was in full and luxuriant health.

From a very early period, the miserable state of Connaught had grown into a proverb. In our own recollection of it, even in prosperous times, it contrasted very unfavourably with other, and less fertile, parts of Ireland. Its naked and unsheltered plains, covered with a net-work of rude single stone-walls, dividing the country into irregular patches, miscalled gardens—its unsightly hovels—frequently mere holes cut into the ground or bog—covered with what are called “scraws,” exhibiting whole families living in darkness, squalor, and smoke—its uneducated and uncared-for population—its dirty and stunted towns, whose chief ornament consisted of a barrack and a gaol, attracted the attention and offended the eye of a stranger, who, at the same time, observing the landscape chequered with luxuriant crops of potatoes and corn, and the green hills covered with cattle, might feel surprised how such poverty could exist in the immediate neighbourhood of such apparent wealth—how it was that the labourer was deemed apparently unworthy of his hire; and he would be tempted to exclaim, with Virgil,

“Sic vos non vobis, fertis aratra boves!”

Whence arose this state of things? Whence arose this apparent want of affinity between the labouring population and prosperity? The practice of leasing large tracts of land to middlemen, aggravated very much the evils which were probably found pre-existing. The rapid increase of population, without any corresponding increase of employment, by which labour might be absorbed and labourers supported, made the possession of small farms necessary for the existence of the population. The competition for these small holdings carried their value in the market to an extravagant height; and, to enable them to hold possession of them, the occupiers were obliged to be contented with the meanest kind of food, and the coarsest kind of clothing. Middlemen—and proprietors following their example—found it more profitable to stock their lands with people than with cattle; the latter required to be well fed, well housed, and constantly attended to; the former required and received no attention or care, and were found profitable directly in proportion to the degree of misery in which they could exist.

To prevent infinitesimal subdivision of land, several acts against sub-letting were passed, which, however, remained—as far as regarded the greater part of the province—a dead letter on the statute-book. These enactments were an effort to remove the symptoms without touching on the source of the disease. In a fertile and but half cultivated district, when the population was not half what it is now, there should have been little difficulty in finding employment for the labouring poor. However, unfortunately at that time, the state of the law of landlord and tenant acted as an effectual bar to outlay by middlemen, who were only anxious to make what money they could of their lands during their leases, and leave them at their expiration of as little value as possible.

Under that law, all buildings and such permanent improvements in a farm, became ultimately the property of the landlord. In most parts of the province of Connaught, farms possessed no sort of farming accommodation; farm house and offices there are none; everything is required, and landlords have not had the means to—at least they did not provide—the necessary accommodations, and a farmer undertaking to cultivate land himself should have provided all these at his own expense. These expenses were too considerable to be incurred on the prospect of being repaid by the enjoyment of the premises during the continuance of a short lease, so that middlemen were, to a certain extent, driven to adopt the course of letting out their land to the peasantry in small portions. Thus, these two sources of evil proceeded, re-acting the one upon the other; the state of the law preventing middlemen from making improvements, and thus giving employment. And this very want of employment rendering small holdings the more necessary for the labouring poor, their rents higher, and, in consequence, the inducement greater to landlords and middlemen to adopt this system in the management of their lands.

And the law is not different now from what it was then; still the landlord becomes entitled, at the expiration of the lease, to the benefit of all the improvements made by the tenant during its continuance; still the wide fields of Connaught are naked, destitute of farm-houses, of farm offices, still—in despite of the failure of the potato—farmed on the old system of letting them out to a cottier peasantry. Is it reasonable to suppose that while the same causes continue to operate, results of a different character will follow? We are confident that similar results will be produced, as long as this injustice to improving tenants is continued, and that an alteration of the law, by which a tenant will be secured the enjoyment of property which he has himself created, will necessarily precede any improvement either in the appearance, or the surface of the country, or in the condition of its inhabitants.

We know it will be objected, that any enactment of this kind would be such an interference with the rights of property as could not be tolerated; that if any such principle were admitted, landlords might be improved out of their properties; that all arrangements with respect to outlay and compensation should be left to the parties themselves, and that in the end all interference by the legislature would be found to do more harm than good.

As to interference with the right of property, we apprehend the present rule of law interferes more with the very right of property than the alteration which we suggest. We do not understand how the fact of a house, or other permanent improvement, having been erected on land at the cost of another person, necessarily gives the landlord a right to the ultimate property in this house or improvement, and, on the other hand, we do not know on what principle of equity a man is to be deprived of property whose very existence is the result of his own outlay and industry, merely because the property of the soil is in another person. Landlords should be content with receiving the full value of their lands, and they should not calculate on increasing their rentals by obtaining possession of property neither theirs, nor created by them. As to being improved out of their properties, it amounts to this, that tenants might create more property, that is, make more improvements on their farms than landlords would be willing to purchase, and, admitting that this might take place—however it might prevent a landlord increasing his rental—it certainly would greatly augment his security for the rent at which he originally let the land, so that, far from improving a landlord out of his property, it would secure him in the receipt of his present income, and, on the supposition that he will not do anything to increase it himself, we do not think him entitled to more.

As to leaving arrangements as to outlay and compensation to private agreement, we would suggest that this is inapplicable in the case of existing leases, that there are large classes of proprietors who are not in a position to make arrangements of this kind, which would amount to charging the inheritance; and lastly, that the experiment has been tried for several centuries, and having produced no beneficial results, it might be well now at length to try the effect of another system. And, as to the legislature doing injury by its interference, we are sorry to say there is very little cause to apprehend any such consequence, as the state of Connaught is at present as bad as it can be, which is an argument against the continuance of a system under whose operation this result has been arrived at.

An enactment providing that every person should have secured to him the enjoyment of the wealth which his industry called into existence, could never be considered an inequitable one. Under the protection of an enactment founded on this principle, the occupiers of land would feel that by their exertions they were realizing property for themselves and their families, and not for their landlords; their farms would improve in appearance and in value, and they would limit the amount of employment given, only when they found it unproductive.

There have been some very important decisions recently made in this country as to the exemption from, or operation of, the statute of limitations, 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27. We allude particularly to the cases of Hunt v. Bateman, 10 I. E. R. 360; Dundas v. Blake, ante, p. 121; and Bennett v. Barnard, ante, p. 145.

The two former arose on the effect of a trust in a will, and the latter on the pendency of a suit, as preventing the bar of the statute.

Immediately after the passing of the act, courts of Equity appear to have struggled against its applicability to cases of general trusts created by wills; nor was the distinction very well defined as to what cases were within the saving of the 25th section, and what without the bar of the 40th. The words of the latter appeared sufficiently explicit, "no action, or suit, or other proceeding, shall be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment, or lien, or otherwise charged upon, or payable out of, any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for, or release of, the same."

The saving in the 25th was confined to cases where "land or rent was vested in a trustee upon any express trust."

On these two sections an infinite number of decisions have been made. Much property was involved in their adjudication, and the struggle has been generally keen to maintain demands barred by law; yet, generally, "just debts," the forbearance of creditors, and the procrastinating habits of the people of this country, eventuating in the loss of their demands. Baron Pennefather, in speaking of the statute in Hunt v. Bateman, observed, that it was "a matter of regret, and must strike every person as not redounding very much to the credit of the makers of the statute, made and passed nearly fifteen years ago, that in the decisions on it so much contradiction should have taken place." The framers of the statute might perhaps have retorted with considerable fairness that the reprehension of the learned Baron would have applied with as much justice to its expositors as to its makers.

The first case in this country was that of Knox v. Kelly, (6 L. R. N. S. 222.) There the testator directed his debts to be paid, and, subject thereto, devised his real estate. It did not appear that there was any interposition of trustees between the creditor and devisee; "no vesting of land or rent in a trustee upon any express trust." The will was in 1810; the debt created in 1791, no payment subsequently to 1796, the application in 1837.

Sir Michael O'Loughlen held the debt not barred, and desired "it might be distinctly understood that he rested his decision entirely upon the trust in the will." And this decision was followed by Lord Plunket in Dillon v. Cruise, (3 I. E. R. 70,) where the devise was to beneficial owners, subject to the payment of his just debts, which the testator directed to be paid in the first instance. No interposition of trustees, no vesting of land or rent in a trustee upon any express trust. The Chancellor, however, was of opinion that there was an express trust created by the will, not a mere general charge, but a devise upon the condition of paying the debts, and he held that the case was not governed by the statute of limitations, and that the law was on the same basis as it had been prior to the passing of the act. Although there were other circumstances in each case, yet the principle to be extracted is as we have stated it.

These were strong decisions, for it was not very easy to understand how the latter case did not range within the 40th section. It was a suit to recover a sum of money secured by judgment charged upon, or payable out of, land. And it was tolerably clear that it was not within the saving of the 25th section, as that applied to land, not to a gross sum of money charged on land.

The statute was thus rendered almost altogether nugatory, its policy subverted, and, in fact, the evils which it was designed to check were set up afresh. It became very difficult to determine the effect in a will of a general charge for the payment of debts, and, if not within the bar of the statute, they might start up at any distance of time, and each particular case would have been susceptible of the nicest distinctions, and have been decided very much according to its particular circumstances, or the fancy of the judge—in favour of the debt, if he were disposed to fulfil the "pious intentions of the testator," and prevent him "from sinning in his grave," or of the devisee, if he were opposed to the setting up of "stale demands."

We have stated these cases particularly, because we think they may now be considered as virtually overruled. The first blow struck at their authority was by the present Chief Justice, when Master of the Rolls, in the case of Knox v. Kelly, (6 I. E. R. 279). That case was undistinguishable from those we have stated, except that the demand was for a legacy, not a debt, and this in fact constituted no solid ground of distinction. It was there held that the legacy was within the 40th section, barred by it, and not saved by the trust created by the will.

The cases under discussion were further undermined by decisions of Sir E. Sugden and Sir James Wigram, who decided that where estates are in the hands of a beneficial devisee, subject to the payment of debts, there is a liability—not a trust—created, and that the creditor will be barred if he does not pursue his remedies before the time given by the statute has elapsed, Hughes v. Kelly (3 Dru. & War. 48); Harrison v. Duigenan (2 Dru. & War. 295); Francis v. Grover, (5 Hare, 1).

In Hunt v. Bateman, the question was very carefully considered; and there, though more than thirty years had passed without any payment of principal or interest, or any acknowledgment of the debt, it was held not barred. But the distinction between that case and those we have adverted to, and on which the decision was made to turn, was this, that where estates are conveyed to trustees, and they stand between the creditor and the beneficial owner, so long as the estate remains in their hands, the trust remains and the debt subsists; but the learned judges were of opinion, that where there was a general charge created, and the lands were in the hands of a beneficial owner, no trust would be created, so as to prevent the bar of the statute.

It may, with fairness, be contended that where the legal estate is in the hands of trustees, the cases range within the 25th section of the act; but Mr. Baron Lefroy did not rest the decision upon that, and conceived such cases entirely out of the operation of the statute; he observes—

"It is not within the 25th section, because, though a suit by a cestui que trust against his trustee, it is not a suit to recover "the land," but a sum of money. Nor is it within the 40th section, because, though a proceeding to recover a sum of money, it is not a sum of money charged upon land merely in any of the ways mentioned in that section. It is a suit by a cestui que trust against his trustee, to oblige him to perform his trust, by raising and paying the sum of money, for the raising and paying of which he holds the estate. In fact, it is a suit altogether out of the statute, but within that well-established principle of a Court of Equity, that as between an express trustee and cestui que trust length of time creates no bar, and with that principle this statute was not designed to interfere in this class of cases."

It will be observed, that the opinion of the learned judges in the foregoing case was not necessary for their decision of the point before them, and was, therefore, so far extra-judicial.

The point was fairly raised in Dundas v. Blake. On reference to our report, it will be seen that the trust created by the will was general; and that the lands, without the intervention of trustees, was given to the devisees beneficially. Counsel for the plaintiffs pressed very strongly upon the court, that the distinction taken in Hunt v. Buteman was not justified by authority or principle—that a Court of Equity only looked to the intention of the testator, and that it was perfectly immaterial, in that view, in whose hands the estates were; if in the hands of the beneficial devisee he was, by the will, constituted a trustee—that if the same instrument gave the benefit, it gave the burthen likewise—that a Court of Equity would not permit him to retain the former and divest himself of the latter—that the distinction was more one of words than substance; and it was asked, How could it be maintained that the debt was saved, where the legal estate was in the hands of a naked trustee who never acted, and barred in those of the man in whom the testator reposed personal confidence, whose conscience was directly affected with the trust—that, so far as the creditor was concerned, the trust was raised whether with, or without an intermediary; and it was urged that the case was within that class defined by Baron Lefroy, and expressly within the authority of Dillon v. Cruise.

His lordship, however, decided against the plaintiffs, and was of opinion that a devise, subject to the payment of debts, did not constitute the devisee a trustee, so as to take the case out of the operation of the statute; and seemed to think that the Court of Exchequer thought the law more settled than it really was in cases apparently within the 25th section.

The effect of this decision is obviously of great importance; for we suppose it may be now considered as settled—if any question is ever to be so treated which has arisen under the Statute of Limitations—that a general charge created for the payment of debts, where the estate is given directly to the trustee, will not prevent the bar of the statute.

4. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas an act was passed in the 58 G. 3, c. 43, and whereas an act was passed in the session of parliament held in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty, to amend and extend the provisions of the said first-recited act: and whereas it is expedient to remove doubts which have arisen whether the said acts extend to the tributary streams of rivers, and the provisions of the said secondly-mentioned act extend to salmon trout and fish of the salmon kind: be it enacted, that in the construction of the said acts, the words "river" and "rivers" shall include all the tributary streams of such river and rivers respectively.

2. That all the provisions, in the said act of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty contained for the protection of salmon shall extend to salmon trout and fish of the salmon kind, as if in every case where salmon is in such act mentioned salmon trout and fish of the salmon kind had been also expressly mentioned.

3. That with respect to any offence committed before the passing of this act the said acts shall be construed as if this act had not been passed.

4. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed during the present session of parliament.

An Act for the more speedy trial and punishment of juvenile offenders in Ireland.

[14th August, 1848.]

- sec. 1. Persons in Ireland not exceeding 14 years of age committing certain offences may be summarily convicted by two justices. If offence not proved, or it is not expedient to inflict punishment, justices may dismiss parties. If charge is thought fit for indictment, &c., case to be dealt with as if this act had not passed.
2. Power to justices to hear and determine cases under this act. One Dublin metropolitan justice may, in certain cases, perform acts usually done by two in petty sessions.
3. Proceedings under this act to bar further proceedings.
4. Mode of compelling the appearance of persons punishable on summary conviction.
5. Power to one justice to remand for further examination, and admit to bail.
6. Application of fines.
7. As to the summoning and attendance of witnesses.
8. As to service of summons.
9. Form of conviction.
10. No conviction to be quashed for want of form, nor removed by certiorari.
11. Convictions to be returned to the quarter sessions.
12. No forfeiture upon convictions under this act, but presiding justices may order restitution of property.
13. Recovery of penalties.
14. Proceedings against persons acting under this act.
15. Act to extend to Ireland only.
16. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas, in order in certain cases to ensure the more 'speedy trial of juvenile offenders' be it enacted, that every person who shall be charged with having committed, or having attempted to commit, or with having been an aider, or procurer in the commission of any offence in Ireland, which now is or hereafter shall or may be declared to be simple larceny, or punishable as simple larceny, and whose age at the period of the commission of such offence shall not, in the opinion of the justices, exceed the age of fourteen years, shall, upon conviction thereof, upon his own confession or upon proof before any two or more justices of the peace for any county, riding, division, borough, liberty, or place in petty sessions assembled, be committed to the common gaol or house of correction within the jurisdiction of such justices, to be imprisoned with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding three months, or, in the discretion of such justices, shall pay such sum, not exceeding three pounds, as the said justices shall adjudge, or, if a male, shall be once whipped, instead of or in addition to such imprisonment, or imprisonment with hard labour; and the justices shall appoint some fit person to inflict the said whipping when ordered to be inflicted out of prison: provided that if such justices, shall deem the offence not proved, or that it is not expedient to inflict any punishment, they shall dismiss the party on finding surety for good behaviour, or without such sureties, and deliver to the party a certificate under the hands of such justices, stating such dismissal, and such certificate shall be in the form set forth in the schedule hereto annexed: provided that if such justices shall be of opinion, that the charge is from any circumstance a fit subject for prosecution by indictment, or if the parent or next friend of the person charged shall, upon his or her being called upon to answer the charge, object to the case being summarily disposed of under this act, such justices shall deal with the case as if this act had not been passed.

2. That any two or more justices before whom any such person charged with any offence made punishable under this act shall be brought or appear, are hereby authorized to hear and determine the case under this act: provided one or more divisional justice or justices of Dublin metropolis, sitting at any divisional police office, may hear and determine every charge under this act, and exercise all the powers herein contained, in like manner as two or more justices of the peace can do by virtue of this act.

3. That every person who shall have obtained such certificate of dismissal and every person who shall have been convicted under this act, shall be released from all other proceedings for the same cause.

4. And for the more effectual prosecution of offences punishable upon summary conviction by virtue of this act, be it enacted, that where any person whose age is alleged not to exceed fourteen shall be charged with any such offence, on the oath of a credible witness, before any justice of the peace, such justice may issue his summons to apprehend the person so charged to appear before any two justices of the peace as aforesaid, at a time and place to be named in such summons or warrant.

5. That any justice or justices of the peace, may remand for further examination or for trial, or suffer to go at large upon his or her finding sufficient surety, any person charged before him or them with any such offence as aforesaid; and every such surety shall be bound by recognizance to be conditioned for the appearance of such person for further examination, or for trial before two or more justices of the peace assembled as aforesaid, or for trial at some superior court, and every such recognizance may be enlarged by any such justice or justices to such further time as he or they shall appoint; and every such recognizance which shall not be enlarged shall be discharged without fee or reward, when the party shall have appeared according to the condition thereof.

6. That every fine imposed by any justice or justices under this act shall be awarded to the use of the public hospital or infirmary of the county in which the offence may have been committed, and shall be accounted for in like manner and subject to the same regulations as all other fines imposed by any justice or justices of the peace in Ireland.

7. That any justice of the peace, by summons, may require the attendance of any person as a witness upon the hearing of any case before two justices, at a time and place to be named in such summons; and such justice may require and bind by recognizance all persons whom he may consider necessary to be examined to attend at the time and place to be appointed by him, there to give evidence upon the hearing of such charge; and in case any person so summoned shall neglect or refuse to attend in pursuance of such summons or recognizance, then upon proof being first given of such person's having been duly summoned, or bound by recognizance the justices before whom any such person ought to have attended may issue their warrant to compel his appearance as a witness.

8. That every summons issued under this act may be served by delivering a copy of the summons to the party, or by delivering a copy of the summons to some inmate at such party's usual place of abode; and every person so required by any writing under the hand or hands of any justice or justices to attend and give evidence shall be deemed to have been duly summoned.

9. That the justices before whom any person shall be summarily convicted of any such offence as herein-before mentioned may cause the conviction to be drawn up in the form of words set forth in the schedule to this act or in any other form of words to the same effect, which conviction shall be good and effectual to all intents and purposes.

10. That no such conviction shall be quashed for want of form, or be removed by certiorari or otherwise into any of Her Majesty's superior Courts of Record; and no warrant of commitment shall be held void by reason of any defect therein, provided it be therein alleged that the party has been convicted, and there be a good and valid conviction to sustain the same.

11. That the justices of the peace before whom any person shall be convicted under this act shall transmit the conviction and recognizances to the clerk of the peace for the county, borough, liberty, or place wherein the offence shall have been committed, there to be kept by the proper officer among the records of the court of general quarter sessions of the peace; and the said clerk of the peace shall transmit to the chief or under secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a monthly return of the names, offences, and punishments mentioned in the convictions.

12. That no conviction under this act shall be attended with any forfeiture, but whenever any person shall be deemed guilty under this act the presiding justices may order restitution of the property to the owner or his representatives; and if such property shall not then be forthcoming, the same Justices, whether they award punishment or dismiss the complaint, may inquire into and ascertain the value, and order payment of such sum of money to the true owner by the person or persons convicted, either at one time or by instalments as the court may deem reasonable.

13 That whenever any justices of the peace shall adjudge any offender to pay a pecuniary penalty under this act, and such penalty shall not be paid, such justices, may appoint some future day for the payment of such penalty, and order the offender to be detained in safe custody until the day so appointed, unless such offender shall give security for his or her appearance on such day; and such justices are hereby empowered to take such security, by way of recognizance or otherwise, at their discretion; and if at the time so appointed such penalty shall not be paid, the same or any other justices of the peace, by warrant under their hands and seals, may commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction within their jurisdiction, there to remain for any time not exceeding three calendar months, reckoned from the day of such adjudication, such imprisonment to cease on payment of the said penalty.

14. And for the protection of persons acting in the execution of this act, be it enacted, that all actions and prosecutions to be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of this act shall be laid and tried in the county where the fact was committed, and shall be commenced within three calendar months after the fact committed; and notice in writing of such action or prosecution, and of the cause thereof, shall be given to the defendant one calendar month at least before the commencement of the action or prosecution; and in any such action or prosecution the defendant may plead the general issue, and give this act and the special matter in evidence at the trial and no plaintiff shall recover in any such action if tender of sufficient amends shall have been made before such action brought, or if a sufficient sum of money shall have been paid into court after such action brought by or on behalf of the defendant; and if a verdict shall pass for the defendant, or the plaintiff shall become nonsuit, or discontinue any such action or prosecution after issue joined, or if, upon demurrer or otherwise, judgment shall be given against the plaintiff, the defendant shall recover his full costs as between attorney and client, and have the like remedy for the same as any defendant hath by law in other cases; and though a verdict shall be given for the plaintiff in such action, the plaintiff shall not have costs against the defendant, unless the judge before whom the trial shall be, shall certify his approbation of the action, and of the verdict obtained thereupon.

15 And be it enacted, that this act shall extend to Ireland only.

16. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

CAP. LXVIII.

An Act for extending to Ireland an Act passed in the last session of parliament, intitled An Act for better securing trust funds, and for the relief of trustees.
[31st August, 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Trustees may pay trust monies, or transfer stocks and securities, into the Court of Chancery or Exchequer in Ireland. Certificate of Accountant-general to be sufficient discharge.
2. Courts of Chancery or Exchequer to make orders on petition, without bill, for application of trust monies and administration of trust.
3. Where concurrence of all the trustees, &c. cannot be procured, the court or judge empowered to order transfer of monies, &c. by the major part of such trustees, &c.

4. Lord Chancellor, with Master of the Rolls or the Court of Exchequer, may make orders for payment, &c.

5. No money paid under this act liable to usher's poundage.

6. Affidavit to state that legacy duty has been paid.

7. Construction of expression "Lord Chancellor."

8. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas it is expedient to extend the provisions of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96,' be it enacted, that all trustees, executors, administrators, or other persons having in their hands any monies belonging to any trust, or the major part of them, shall be at liberty, on filing an affidavit describing the instrument creating the trust, to pay the same, with the privy of the Accountant General of the high Court of Chancery or of the Accountant General of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, into the bank of Ireland, to the account of such Accountant General in the matter of the trust, in trust to attend the orders of the said courts, and that all trustees or other persons having any annuities or stocks in the books of the bank of Ireland, or of any canal company in Ireland, or any government or parliamentary securities standing in their names, or in the names of any persons of whom they shall be personal representatives, upon any trusts, shall be at liberty to transfer such stocks or securities into or in the name of the said Accountant General, with his privy, in the matter of the trust, in trust to attend the orders of the said courts; and in every such case the certificate of the Accountant General of such payment, or of the transfer or deposit of such stocks or securities, shall be a sufficient discharge to such trustees or other persons for the money so paid or the stocks or securities so transferred or deposited.

2. That such orders shall be made by the said court of Chancery or Court of Exchequer, in respect of the trust monies, stocks, or securities so paid in, transferred, and deposited, and for the investment and payment of any such monies, or of any dividends or interest on any such stocks or securities, and for the transfer and delivery out of any such stocks and securities, and for the administration of any such trusts generally, upon petition presented in a summary way, by such party or parties as shall appear to be necessary in that behalf, and service of such petition shall be made upon such person or persons as the court shall direct; and every order made upon such petition shall have the same authority, and shall be enforced and subject to re-hearing and appeal in the same manner, as if the same had been made in a suit instituted in the court; and if it shall appear that any such trust funds cannot be distributed without the institution of one or more suit or suits, the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls, or the said court of Exchequer, may direct any such suit or suits to be instituted.

3. That if upon any such petition it shall appear to the court or judge that any monies, annuities, stocks, or securities are vested in any persons as trustees, executors, or administrators, or otherwise, upon trusts within the meaning of this act, and that the major part of such persons are desirous of transferring, paying, or delivering the same to the Accountant General of the high Court of Chancery, or to the Accountant General of the court of Exchequer in Ireland, under this act, but that the concurrence of the other or others of them cannot be had, the said courts of Chancery and Exchequer respectively may order that such transfer, payment, or delivery be made by the major part of such persons without the concurrence of the other or others of them; and where any such monies or government or parliamentary securities shall be deposited with any banker, broker, or other depositary, such courts respectively may make such order for the payment or delivery or transfer of such monies, government or parliamentary securities, to the major part of such trustees, executors, administrators, or other persons for the purpose of being paid or delivered or transferred to the said Accountant General, as to the said courts shall seem meet; and every transfer of any annuities, stocks, or securities, and every payment of money or delivery of securities, in pursuance of any such order, shall be as effectual as if the same had been made by all the persons entitled to the annuities, stocks, or securities so transferred, or the monies or securities so paid or delivered, and shall fully protect and indemnify the governor and company of the bank of Ireland, and all other persons acting under or in pursuance of such order.

4. That the Lord Chancellor, with the assistance of the Master of the Rolls, shall have power and is hereby authorized to make such orders as shall seem necessary for carrying the provisions of this act into effect; and the said court of Exchequer shall have the like power and authority in respect to payments, transfers or deposits made to or with the Accountant General of that court.

5. That no money so paid into the bank of Ireland to the credit of the Accountant General of the court of Chancery, or paid out under any order made under this act by the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls, shall be liable to usher's poundage.

6. That every affidavit made on the occasion of any payment of money or transfer or deposit of stocks or securities under this act by any personal representative shall state that the legacy duty has been duly paid.

7. That in the construction of this act the expression "the Lord Chancellor" shall mean and include the Lord Chancellor, Lord Keeper and Lords Commissioners for the custody of the great seal of Ireland, for the time being.

8. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. LXIX.

An act to repeal so much of an act of the parliament of Ireland of the twenty-third and twenty-fourth years of King George the Third, "for the more effectually punishing such persons as shall by violence obstruct the freedom of corn markets and the corn trade, and who shall be guilty of other offences therein mentioned, and for making satisfaction to the parties injured," as relates to the making of satisfaction to the parties injured; and to substitute other provisions in lieu thereof; and to repeal the provisions of the acts which give remedies against any hundreds or baronies in Ireland in respect of robbery.

Sec. 1. So much of recited act as relates to proceedings in actions and recovery of damages repealed.

2. Damages sustained by means of offences against recited act to be recovered by like proceedings as damages are recovered under 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 116, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 106. Compensation for offences committed in the city of Dublin may be recovered under 4 & 5 Vict. c. 10.

3. Actions commenced before passing of this act for recovery of damages under first-recited act may be discontinued, and such damages may be recovered by presentment of grand jury.

4. So much of acts 13 Edw. 1, 28 Edw. 3., and 10 & 11 Car. 1, as relates to remedies against hundreds or baronies in Ireland repealed. Persons having sustained damage, and for which they might have a remedy under recited acts, may, having commenced an action, proceed to recover damages and costs under this act. Where damages to be levied.

5. Act to extend only to Ireland.

6. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas by 23 & 24 G. 3, (I.) it is enacted, that if any persons, unlawfully, riotously, and tumultuously assembled together, shall after the passing of the said act wilfully and maliciously destroy, or shall begin to destroy, any storehouse, mill, granary, corn stack, or other place where corn, grain, meal, malt, flour, or potatoes are usually stored, or shall unlawfully attempt to enter or break into, any such storehouse, mill, granary, or other place, or take, or spoil, or attempt by force to take, or spoil, any corn, meal, malt, flour, or potatoes which shall be stored or kept therein, or shall unlawfully enter on any ship, vessel, or boat wherein any corn, grain, meal, malt, flour, or potatoes shall be laden, and wilfully take, carry away, destroy, or damage any of the said articles laden therein, or wilfully cut, injure, spoil, or take away the said ship, or boat, or the rigging, furniture, tackle, or rudder, or any part of such ship, or boat, rigging, furniture, or tackle, or by force obstruct or endeavour to obstruct the loading or carrying any of the said articles on board any ship, or boat, or shall unlawfully, prevent or endeavour to prevent any ship, or boat laden therewith, or in which any of said articles shall be laden, from sailing, or shall unlawfully, and by force, detain, take, or drive away any horse, car, cart, carriage, or boat laden with any of the said articles on the way to or from any mill, store, granary, or market, sea-port or place of shipping, with the intent to prevent the corn, grain, meal, malt, flour, bread, biscuit, or potatoes therein, or laden thereon, or any part thereof, from being taken to the house, vessel, storehouse, place, or person to which it was intended to be carried, or shall kill or maim any horse or horses or other beast or beasts laden therewith, or shall cut or otherwise break or destroy any of the sacks, or scatter any of the aforesaid articles, wherewith such car, cart, carriage, horse, or boat is or shall be laden, or take away or distribute, or compel the owner, driver, or conductor thereof to distribute, sell, or otherwise dispose of any such article wherewith such car, cart, carriage, boat, horse, or other beast is laden, or any part thereof, or shall destroy any weir, sluice, mill dam, drain, or outwork belonging or appertaining to any mill, every such person so offending in any of the said matters, and all persons unlawfully, riotously, or tumultuously assembled, who shall aid or assist in the commitment or the attempting to commit any of the said offences, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall be adjudged felons, and shall suffer the punishment in that act provided; and that all damages sustained by the offences aforesaid, or by any violence contrary to the said act, may be recovered by action in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record in this kingdom, by the person or persons injured, his, her, or their executors or administrators, against the chief or other magistrate of the county of the town or city, or against any one or more of the inhabitants of the parish in any county; and if judgment shall be given for the plaintiff or plaintiffs, the damages recovered, together with the costs, shall be levied, and paid to the plaintiff or plaintiffs, his, her, or their executors or administrators: and whereas great expenses are incurred in proceeding under the said recited act, and it is expedient that such damages should be recoverable by more summary proceedings: be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act so much of the said act as provides that any damages sustained by means of any of the offences, or by any violence committed against or contrary to the said recited act, may be recovered by action as aforesaid; or as relates to the proceedings in any such action, or to the recovery of such damages, shall be and is hereby repealed, save and except as to any action or proceeding commenced for such damages sustained by any such offence or violence heretofore committed.

DUBLIN, MARCH 17, 1849.

The proposition of Sir Robert Peel for a resettling of the province of Connaught—on the plan of the Plantation of Ulster—has taken the public somewhat by surprise. But, although the magnitude of the measure is at first sight rather astounding, yet it is very far from being an impracticable one, or one, the result of which would not redound inculcably to the national advantage.

The two great facts on which are based the argument for the necessity of some such bold and comprehensive policy are; Firstly, that before any practicable good can be effected in the suffering districts of Ireland a change of proprietors must take place; And secondly, that in order to prepare for, and effectuate such a change, a legislative interference will be necessary.

The recent attempt to effect a transfer of property on a large scale, through the medium of private interference, has proved a failure. This was the design of the Irish Incumbered Estates Act, which, for many reasons heretofore adverted to by us, has signally failed, and, unless much altered, will never be the means of any large amount of property changing hands. As a palliative for existing evils in this country it is totally useless, and simply, because those estates most requiring a change of proprietors are just those least likely to find purchasers.

We have already demonstrated that none but the owners of incumbered estates will avail themselves of this act, and few of that class will be inclined to do so. Their energies are prostrate—their means a blank, and, above all, they have nothing to expect for themselves by forcing into a depreciated market their ill-cultivated, and over-peopled estates. And, when lands lie waste, and hands are idle, and no limit to the liability to poor-rate, who would become a purchaser? In such cases, that the intermediate ownership of the crown would be productive of much good, cannot be questioned. No dwarf remedy can abate an evil so gigantic.

A great proportion of the lands in the distressed districts of Ireland requires the hand of the improver to render them fit for profitable cultivation, and many of our prudent resident landlords have long acted on this principle in the management of their own estates. When they find a tenant pauperised, his land exhausted, and incapable of paying either rent or rates, they take the farm into their own hands, and improve its condition, and, when it is said to be brought "into heart," hand it over to a better cultivator, with means and will to make it productive for his own benefit and that of his landlord. And, on a large scale, this is just the office proposed to the government commissioner by Sir Robert Peel's plan.

Now, the land, and the people of Ireland, are "out of heart." To restore the one, and revive the other, we hope soon to hear of the introduction of a bill to carry into effect this plan, or some modification of it. The present is not the time for entering into the detail of the question, or the manner of working it out, but, as a matter more peculiarly within our own province, we would point to the large amount of rental of Ireland under the management of the Court of Chancery, as a vast field upon which the government commissioner might at once commence his operations, with great ease to the executive, and great advantage to all interested.

The estates under the control of the court offer many facilities for the purpose; and, in the most distressed of the western counties, viz., Galway, Mayo, Sligo, and Roscommon, we find by the Chancery return of last session that the number of properties under the Courts of Chancery and Equity Exchequer are 153, representing a rental of about £120,000 per annum.

The greater number of these properties are destined to be sold for payment of debts. The amount of incumbrances, and the rights of parties, are generally ascertained; and, as the reported creditors—we may presume—would have no objection to accept of charges on the consolidated fund in lieu of their claims on the land, no impediment would stand in the way of the Commissioner—armed with a Chancery injunction—at once going into possession.

A very grave question here presents itself to our consideration, namely, how far the Court of Chancery, with its great power for good or for ill, might not, at least to a certain extent, have fulfilled some of the duties to be allotted to the government commissioner, by acting, through its officers, as the intervening mediator between the litigant creditor, the owner of the estate, and the occupiers of the soil—and thereby have saved or avoided much of the misery which the occupants of such estates, and the owners of them, are now suffering.

When the owner of an estate is deprived of the superintendence and control of his own affairs—when his tenantry and dependants, those habituated to look up to him for counsel, assistance, and relief in distress—are by the order of the court placed under the dominion of a stranger—when old connexions are broken up, and old feelings and associations disarranged by the embarrassments and difficulties of the landlord, if it be an axiom—which none will now dispute—that property has its duties as well as its rights, at such a moment, and under such circumstances, it is peculiarly necessary that the law which transfers the rights of the owner to another, should at the same time well provide that the recipients of that owner's duties should suffer as little as possible by his misfortunes. We fear we must look in vain for any instance under the court of the exercise of that fostering care of the land, or of the tenantry, so needful in such a case, and we believe we may safely challenge the whole extent of Ireland to produce one solitary instance of improvement in property effected, or real benefit derived, by contact with the Court.

We have already, on more than one occasion, pointed out the evils of, and bad effects resulting from, our present system of the management of property under our Equity courts; and, while that system exists unaltered, we fearlessly assert that no improvement can possibly take place on these estates, or, [we may almost say, on any estates in the vicinity of them, for, in nine cases out of ten, from their neglected condition, they are hot-beds of pauperism, and fruitful nurseries for claimants of out-door relief; inflicting burdens on, and tainting the moral condition of the whole neighbourhood.

Sir Robert Peel dwelt much upon the miserable condition of the people of the Ballina union, and drew from the Report of Captain Hamilton many arguments to prove the necessity for a change of proprietary in Ireland.

That report is indeed instructive, and as suggestive of facts to us as to him; and what does it teach us? that in this small district—admittedly one of the most miserable in Ireland—there are no less than eighteen estates under receivers of the Court of Chancery; and that while the hard-working active, honest resident proprietor, struggles manfully to support his poor, and cultivate his land, he is bowed down and overwhelmed by the supererogating poverty of those neglected Chancery estates.

We believe that the heads and officers of our Equity Courts are feelingly sensible of the evils of the present system, and, as far as their powers extend, would gladly contribute their aid to the improvement of estates under receivers, and the assistance of the poor upon them; but they have little power, unless with the consent of all parties interested. The Court is bound to protect the creditor. He seeks the aid of the law, and demands “penalty and forfeit of his bond,” and the administrators of the law are coerced to guard his rights, no matter at what sacrifice either to the debtor, or to the occupier, or to the interests of the community at large.

The Court appoints its officer to take charge of the estate—and he is not inaptly named a receiver—in contradistinction to the agent of an estate, whose duties are not alone confined to the pounds, shillings, and pence of the rental; but, unfortunately the duty of a Chancery receiver begins and ends with the column of receipts, and the column of arrears. He knows nothing in his dealings with the tenantry of the principle of Give and Take which smooths and facilitates the dealings of mankind with each other. His cry must still be that of “the daughters of the horse-leech—Give, Give!” and, without means or power to improve the land, or stimulate the industry of the people, he must come to his reckoning, and account for his full tale of rent, with all the terrors of disallowed poundage, and personal liability for arrears, hanging over his devoted head.

The responsibilities of the office will render it extremely difficult to procure gentlemen of property or position to undertake the dangerous duties of a Chancery Receiver.

The calamitous condition of our peasantry seems to be a wonder, when such is the system under which a surface of country, representing one million and a half of rental—equivalent to that of the whole province of Connaught—is managed, and on which the average expenditure for improvements does not exceed five shillings per cent. per annum; and when, by the return furnished to parliament last year, it appears that out of a rental of over nine hundred thousand pounds per annum, not one shilling has been expended on improvements since the appointment of the receivers.

We feel happy in the knowledge that the present session will not be allowed to pass, without the appointment of a committee to inquire into this most important subject; and we are aware that a plan has been devised for the better management of estates under the Court of Chancery, by which, with perfect justice to creditor, owner, and occupier, the country at large will be materially benefitted.

A KNOWLEDGE of the legal rights and liabilities arising from the relation of landlord and tenant under instruments not under seal, is of much importance in this country, where parcel demises are so frequent.

We propose from time to time to consider those questions on the subject on which the least information is derivable from treatises on this branch of the law.

The first question we shall consider is, whether there is any warranty or covenant in law respecting the lessor's title, arising from the mere relation of landlord and tenant, there being no demise under seal; and, if so, what is the extent of it.

It would appear plain from every principle of law and justice, that if one man contracts to give another a certain thing for a specified period, and fails to perform that contract, that the former should be answerable for the breach of it. As if A agree to give to B an interest in land for a certain term, and B be evicted before its expiration, he being in no default; from the period of the decision in Slade's case, (4 Coke, 94, a.) to the present day, we know of no case where it has been held that an action for damages would not lie for the breach of such a contract, (Com. Dig. tit. Action, M. 3.) and in some instances an action on the case for the tort. See Boorman v. Brown, (11 Cl. & Fin. 1 S.C. 3 Q. B. 525.) In some recent cases, Messent v. Reynolds, (3 C. B. 194; 15 L. Jou. N. S. C. B. 226; 10 Jur. 550); Jackson v. Coffin, (8 M. & W. 790); Granger v. Collins, (6 M. & W. 458, S. C.; 9 Jou. N. S. Ex. 172), this question came before the courts in Westminster, and the dicta of the learned judges in these cases appear to have originated an opinion that no covenant in law whatever, for title or quiet enjoyment, arose from the mere relation of landlord and tenant. These opinions, when considered, are not, we think, decisions for the abstract propositions they are cited to maintain. They are, in our judgment, unquestionably correct decisions with reference in each case to the subjectam materiam.

Before we enter upon the discussion of this question, there are two expressions of constant reference, those of warranty and implied covenant, the definite meaning of which must be clearly understood.

Warranty in the strict legal sense is not applicable to leaseholds or chattels real, it being a covenant real attaching to the land, not to the person; the person whose land was bound by the warranty being obliged to make the recompense in land, and not in damages, as would be the case in covenant. (Yelv. 139, Co. Litt. 389, a.) It must therefore be taken in the popular sense, that the grantor has that which he purports to grant; as where A agrees to let land for ten years, there is no implied warranty that they are fit for a particular purpose, but merely that he is in condition to grant the land for the number of years agreed upon.

Next, as to what is an implied covenant? An implied covenant is to be drawn from the words of the parties, not their acts. It is an implication of what the parties intended to express, but have not correctly expressed; as where a man said he would "warrant and defend the quiet enjoyment of the lessor during the term." These words, not amounting to an express covenant, as there can be no warranty of a chattel,—the court, in Williams v. Burrell, (14 Law Jour. N. S. 99, C. B. S. C. 1 C. B. 402,) held to amount to an implied covenant. An implied covenant, when it is once ascertained that such was within the intention of the parties, is therefore in the nature of an express one, and an action for the breach of it will lie against the executor of the covenantor, which is not so in the case of a covenant in law which is that which arises from the word demise, (Williams v. Burrell), and which is that which we contend arises from the relation of landlord and tenant existing under contracts not under seal. The expression "implied covenant," is not therefore strictly applicable to such a case, in which the only liability that can exist is a covenant in law, arising from the contract of the lessor that he has that which he promises to give, and that the lessee shall enjoy it quietly during the term.

If A. contracts to deliver goods to B. and fails to do so, an action will lie for the non-delivery. It has been also decided that if A. agrees to let land to B., and C. being in possession, refuses to give up possession, that an action will lie by B. against A. for the non-performance of his contract. Coe v. Clay, (5 Bing. 440). It would appear unquestionable, but for the cases referred to, that from every contract of letting or hiring, there results a necessary legal obligation on the part of the lessor to put the lessee in possession of the thing let, and to give not merely the possession, but to undertake that the lessee shall hold it for the term contracted for. In Sutton v. Temple, (12 M. & W. 52), Parke, B. says, "The word demise merely annexes to it a condition that the party demising has a good title to the premises, and that the lease shall not be evicted," and in Hart v. Windsor, (12 M. & W. 68).—"It is clear that from the word demise in a lease under seal, the law implies a covenant; in a lease not under seal, a contract for title to the estate merely, that is, for quiet enjoyment against the lessor, and all that come in under him by title, and against others claiming by title paramount during the term, and the word let, or any equivalent words which constitute a lease, have no doubt the same effect, but not more." In both these cases the question before the court was, what covenant in law, as to the fitness of the premises for a particular purpose, arose from the mere contract of letting, a subject we shall hereafter refer to more fully, but the opinion of the court was delivered after much deliberation, and on a subject in the consideration of which the present question must have necessarily been before it. The observations of the learned judge, which, under a different state of facts, would necessarily decide this question, cannot be regarded as mere ill-considered dicta thrown out during the course of a judgment on a different subject. In Hancock v. Caffyn (1 Moo. & Sc. 521). A. agreed with the defendant for the purchase of a house with the furniture, &c. The defendant having permitted the head rent to become in arrear, it was distrained for. A. having in the meanwhile become bankrupt, his assignees brought an action in case against the lessor. Two objections were raised first, that the action should have been in assumpsit, for the breach of contract; and secondly, that there was no implied covenant to indemnify the lessee from the non-performance of the lessor's covenants with the head landlord. Both objections were overruled. This would appear to be an express authority that a covenant in law for quiet enjoyment during the term, arises from a mere contract to let.

We shall now proceed to consider the cases relied on as warranting a different conclusion, and in each it will be found that the covenant, for the breach of which the action was brought, was one either not within the meaning of the legal covenant, which we contend arises, or else that the implied covenant, as stated in the declaration, was so large as to include covenants not within the scope of a covenant in law, and that the count was therefore bad on demurrer, as the court could not say what was the nature of the covenant relied upon as broken.

In Upton v. Ferguson, (3 Moo. & Sc. 88), the action, as in the last cited case, was brought to recover damages for a distress for rent by the head landlord. The plaintiff agreed to take the premises at a yearly rent, and to be liable for the rents to become due to the head landlord after a certain day. The rent was reserved to the head landlord quarterly; and a quarter from the date agreed upon having become in arrear, a distress was made, for which the tenant brought this action. The court held, that the plaintiff having made himself liable for the rents to become due to the head landlord after the commencement of his tenancy, he should have known how it was reserved, and that there was no implied covenant that the rent was reserved yearly. This case, then, clearly is no authority against the position contended for. The case of Messent v. Reynolds (3 C. B. 194, S. C. 10 Jur. 550; 15 L. Jou. N. S. 226, C. B.) is of a somewhat similar character; the tenant agreed to take subject to the terms of an agreement under which his immediate lessor held, the terms of which were not set out in the declaration, and the court held that no covenant in law could be implied in the absence of any information as to the real terms of the agreement under which the plaintiff actually held. In Jackson v. Cobbin (8 M. & W. 790), the covenant sought to be implied, was, that the premises might be used for any purpose; such a covenant, it is evident, could not be implied, and the court gave no express opinion on the abstract question; but the inference is in favour of the affirmative, as the plaintiff had leave to amend, which would not have been granted if the court thought the action unsustainable. The last case we shall refer to is that of Grainger v. Collins (6 M. & W. 458; S. C. 9 L. Jour. N. S. 172). The declaration stated, that in consideration of the letting, the defendant promised the plaintiff that he should quietly enjoy during the term; and that before its termination he was evicted by those entitled to the reversion. The point stated for argument on the demurrer was, "that the declaration stated a larger promise than the law inferred, that it would render the defendant liable for a wrongful eviction of the plaintiff by those entitled to the reversion, or for an eviction in consequence of the plaintiff's own acts ('as was the case here')." The decision the court was called upon to make was merely this, that the declaration did not state correctly the covenant in law which should be implied from the relation of landlord and tenant; and though some members of the court gave utterance to observations going that length, these dicta lose much of their effect, if not wholly overruled, by the decision of the same court in the later cases of Hart v. Windsor and Sutton v. Temple, and the case of Brown v. Crump (1 Marsh. 567), cited in the judgment, would appear to shew that the objection was to the mode of statement of the covenant, and not that no covenant existed, as in that case it was admitted that there was an implied covenant on the part of the tenant to till in a proper and husbandlike manner, but not in a particular manner, as was contended.

The result to be arrived at from the consideration of these authorities appears to be, that as a general rule, when one person lets, or agrees to let land to another, there arises a covenant or contract in law, that he has the ability to grant that which he proposes to give, and that he is liable for the breach of that contract; and the cases referred to as deciding the contrary, are so many exceptions to this rule, arising from the peculiar facts of each case.

Court Papers.

Equity Exchequer.

GENERAL ORDER.

Saturday, 24th February, 1949.

It is this day ordered by the court as follows:—

1. That no recognizance hereafter to be entered into by or for any tenant, receiver, or other person, who, according to the general practice, or orders of the court, or by any special order, made in any cause or matter, may be bound to enter into a recognizance, shall be deemed to be completed within the meaning of such practice or orders, or special order, unless and until in addition to the due enrolment thereof, the same shall be duly registered in the office of registrar of judgments, in pursuance of and according to the provisions of the act of the seventh and eighth years of the reign of Her Majesty, intitled, "an act for the protection of purchasers against judgments, crown debts, lis pendens, and commissions of bankruptcy; and for providing an office for the registry of all judgments in Ireland, and for amending the laws in Ireland respecting bankrupts, and the limitation of actions;" and of an act passed in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her Majesty, intitled, "an act to facilitate the transfer of landed property in Ireland:" but the non-compliance with this order shall not affect the validity of such recognizance at law or in equity, otherwise than as the said act, or either of them, may in such case affect the same, as against purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors.
2. That the chief or second remembrancer shall not perfect any lease under a letting made to a tenant until, in addition to the certificate of the enrolment of his recognizance, a certificate of the said registrar of judgments, of the lodgment and entry of the memorandum or minute of such recognizance required by the said first-mentioned act to be left with him, endorsed on a duplicate of such memorandum or minute, in pursuance of the said act of the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her Majesty, shall be produced.
3. That the production of a like certificate of the regitrar of judgments shall be requisite, with the certificate of the enrolment of the recognizance, to entitle a receiver in a cause, or in the matter of a petition under the mortgage act, or title rent-charge act, to enter the general order, that the tenants do pay their rents and arrears to him; and that no receiver appointed in the matter of a petition under the judgment acts, shall serve the order on the tenants to pay their rents to such receiver until, in addition to the certificate of the enrolment of his recognizance, a certificate of the said registrar of judgments of the lodgment and entry of the memorandum or minute of such recognizance, required by said first-mentioned act to be left with him, endorsed on a duplicate of such memorandum or minute, in pursuance of said act of the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her Majesty, shall be filed in the office of the secondary.

4. That all receivers already appointed shall proceed without delay and before the first day of Easter term next ensuing, to have the several recognizances heretofore entered into by them, or on their behalf, duly registered pursuant to the said acts, in the office of the said registrar of judgments, unless the same have been already registered, and do produce the like certificate of the said registrar as aforesaid, in respect thereto, to the chief or second remembrancer, on the passing of their next accounts, who may therein allow the costs of such registry; and the chief or second remembrancer shall have power to disallow his poundage on such account to any receiver not producing such certificate, dated on or before the said first day of Easter term, unless some satisfactory reason shall be given to him for the delay; and the chief or second remembrancer shall not pass any such account without production of the certificate, and in their certificate of the allowance of the account, shall state that the same was produced, and the date thereof.

5. That to the next statement of facts to be laid before the chief or second remembrancer by any receiver or sequestrator, or to his next account, whichever shall be first lodged after the date hereof, there shall be annexed by way of schedule, a specification of the several tenants by whom recognizances have been entered into, and the amount thereof respectively; and the chief or second remembrancer shall enquire into the same, and shall be at liberty in all cases when he shall think fit, to direct the receiver or sequestrator, on his attorney to effect within a time to be fixed by the chief or second remembrancer, the due registration, under the said acts, of all or any of the said recognizances which it may be proper to have so registered, and to allow the costs thereof in the account of such receiver or sequestrator, and to suspend the passing of any account until such direction shall have been complied with.

6. That any party interested in any cause or matter, or the receiver or sequestrator appointed therein, may register under the said acts, the recognizance of any deceased or discharged receiver or sequestrator, or of any party, which shall not have been vacated, and the chief or second remembrancer may allow in his next account, to any such receiver or sequestrator, the costs of such registration, where he shall think it was proper that the same should have been effected.

7. That the fee of 16s. 8d. shall be allowed to the attorneys of the court for attending to register any judgment, decree, order, crown bond, lis pendens, or recognizance, under the said acts, and for all duties relating thereto, including the preparation and signing of the memorandum and minute to be lodged with the registrar, and a duplicate thereof, but the chief or second remembrancer, in allowing any costs under the fifth foregoing order for the registration of the recognizances of tenants, may allow a lesser sum for each in his discretion, having regard to the number registered by the same attorney, in the same cause or matter.

2. That all damages heretofore sustained, or shall at any time after the passing of this act be sustained, by any person or persons by means of any of such offences against the said recited act, or by any violence committed contrary to the same, shall be recovered by like applications and proceedings, and by like presentments of the grand jury of the county, county of a city, or county of a town, in which any such offence or violence shall have been committed, and subject to like traverses, and to like provisions, and in like manner as by the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 116, and 7 & 8 Vic., respectively is or are provided in relation to the recovery of compensation for damages sustained by the mischievously or wantonly setting fire to, burning, or destroying any house, outhouse, or other building, or any haggard, corn, hay, straw or turf, or the setting fire to, burning, or sinking any boat or barge laden with corn or other provisions, or the killing, maiming, houghing or injuring any horse, mule, ass, or swine, or any horned cattle or sheep, or the damaging, injuring, or destroying any bank, gate, lock, weir, sluice, bridge, dam, or other work belonging to any person, public canal, or navigation; and the provisions of the said two acts shall be applied for the recovery of damages sustained by means of any of such offences against the said first recited act; provided that in the case of any of such offences committed in the county of the city of Dublin, compensation for damages sustained by means thereof shall and may be recovered in like manner as by the 4 & 5 Vic. c. 10, is provided in relation to the malicious burning of houses, barns, haggards, corn, or other articles or effects.

3. That after the passing of this act any person or persons against whom any action shall have been commenced or prosecuted before the passing of this act, for the recovery of any damages sustained by means of any offence or violence committed contrary to the said first-recited act, or the plaintiff or plaintiffs in such action, may apply to any judge of any of the superior courts at Dublin, for an order that such action shall be discontinued; and every such court or judge, upon such application, shall make such order as aforesaid, and shall order the costs of the plaintiff to be taxed as between party and party, and upon the making of such order such action shall be forthwith stayed or discontinued; and thereupon, after such stay of proceedings, the person or persons who shall have so commenced or prosecuted such action, or his, her, or their executors or administrators, may proceed to recover such damages, with the costs, in the same manner as in the immediately preceding provision directed: provided, that such person or persons, or any person or persons who has or have sustained any such damages before the passing of this act, need not serve or post any notice of his, her, or their intention to apply for compensation for any such damages or costs upon any person or persons, save that he, she, or they shall lodge with the secretary of the grand jury, as applications for public works are lodged, an application, setting forth the loss or damages sustained, and the amount thereof, and of such costs so taxed, and setting forth the time and place when and where such injury was done, and the property injured; which application shall be scheduled by the secretary of the grand jury, and be dealt with, as near as may be, as other applications for compensation for damages in other cases.

4. And whereas by acts, 13 Edw. 1, 28 Edw. 3, and 10 & 11 Car. 1, provision is made relating to the recovery of damages against the hundred or barony in respect of robberies committed; and it is expedient that so much of the said recited acts should be repealed, so far as relates to Ireland: be it enacted, that after the passing of this act so much of the said last-recited acts as relates to any remedies against any hundred, or to the recovery of damages against any hundred or barony in Ireland, or the inhabitants thereof, in respect of any robbery, shall be and the same is hereby repealed, save and except as to any action or proceeding heretofore commenced; and in the case of any such action or proceeding heretofore commenced, the same shall and may be stayed and discontinued, in like manner and subject to like regulations as herein-before provided as to staying and discontinuing proceedings, and after such stay of proceedings the person or persons who shall have so commenced or prosecuted such action, or his or their executors or administrators, and also any person or persons who shall have sustained any such damages by means of any robbery, and for which he might now have any remedy under the said recited acts, and who shall not have commenced any action or proceeding therefor, before the passing of this act, his, her, or their executors and administrators, (in either of such cases,) may proceed to recover such damages, and in the case of an action being commenced, the taxed costs as aforesaid, and may recover the same by presentment of the grand jury, in the same manner as in the immediately preceding provisions respectively directed: provided, that such person or persons need not serve or post any notice of his, her, or their intention to apply for compensation for any such damages upon any person or persons, save that he, she, or they shall lodge with the secretary of the respective grand jury, as applications for public works are lodged, an application setting forth the damages sustained, and the amount thereof, and in the case of any action commenced, the taxed costs as aforesaid, and setting forth the time and place when and where such robbery was committed, and the particular property robbed, which application shall be scheduled by the secretary of the grand jury, and be dealt with as other applications for compensation for damages in other cases: provided, that such damages shall be levied off the barony, county of a city, or county of a town, in which such robbery shall have been committed.

5. And be it enacted, that this act shall extend only to Ireland.

6. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

An Act to continue to the 20th day of July 1848, and to the end of the then next session of parliament, Her Majesty's commission for building new churches. [31st August, 1848.]

CAP. LXXII.

An Act to amend the acts relating to the constabulary force in Ireland, and to amend the provisions for the payment of special constables. [31st August, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Power to Lord Lieutenant, &c. to fix salaries of constables.

2. Salary of a limited number of constables under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 75, continued.

3. Number of constabulary chargeable on consolidated fund to be fixed by Lord Lieutenant, &c.

4. Rate of charge on counties and boroughs for constabulary force appointed on application of town council of a borough.

5. Proportion of sub-inspectors and head constables to additional force appointed on certificate of magistrates, or application from town council of a borough.

6. If constabulary shall be ordered under the authority of 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 13, to repair to any other place, &c., and absence exceeds five days, the expense to be charged thereto, and paid by presentment.

7. Where constabulary shall be required under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 46, to keep the peace near railway works, company, &c. requiring the same to pay the expense.

8. Form of certificate to be laid before grand juries.

9. Constabulary to act in adjacent counties.

10. Assistant inspector general, or a county inspector or sub-inspector appointed president by the inspector general or deputy, may inquire and examine on oath into the truth, &c. of charges against constabulary.

11. Oath on appointment may be taken before one magistrate only.

12. Receiver, with consent of treasury, may appoint a person to act for him, and draw on the bank of Ireland, in case of his illness or absence.

13. Orders drawn by justices for payment of special constables under provisions of 2 & 3 W. 4, c. 108, valid.

14. 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 13, &c., and this act, construed as one.

15. Schedules to be part of the act.

16. Act may be amended, &c.

‘Whereas it is expedient to alter and amend several provisions of the acts relating to the constabulary force in Ireland: be it enacted, that the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland may appoint such annual salary as may seem proper to be paid to each constable appointed or to be appointed under any of the acts now in force relating to the constabulary force in Ireland, not exceeding thirty-eight pounds for each mounted constable, and thirty-six pounds for each dismounted constable, and to direct that such annual salary shall commence on and from the first day of April in this present year.

2. ‘And whereas under the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 75, several of the constables of the said force are at present in the receipt of a salary of forty pounds per annum: be it enacted, that each of such constables shall continue to receive the said salary until the Lord Lieutenant shall otherwise direct, and that the Lord Lieutenant may direct the said salary of forty pounds to be paid to any other constables: provided always, that the number of constables receiving such salary shall not at any one time exceed fifteen.

3. ‘And whereas by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 97, it was provided that the whole cost of the constabulary force, save as therein mentioned, should be paid out of the consolidated fund: and whereas it is expedient to determine the number of officers and men whose pay and expenses may, under the said act, be charged upon the said consolidated fund for each county, county of a city, or county of a town in Ireland: be it enacted, that the number of officers and men chargeable to the said consolidated fund shall be such as the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland may consider to be required, but shall not exceed in any year, after 31st March, 1848.

4. ‘And whereas it is expedient to determine the sum to be charged upon each county, or any part or district thereof, or any county of a city or county of a town in Ireland, where, by the laws now in force, one moiety of the expenses of any constabulary force is chargeable thereupon, and also the sum to be charged upon any borough for which a constabulary force shall be appointed, in pursuance of an act of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 108, that after the 31st March, 1848, such cases there shall be chargeable to each such county, county of a city, county of a town, or borough, per annum, for each sub-inspector one moiety of the sum of one hundred and sixty pounds, for each head constable one moiety of the sum of seventy pounds, and for each constable or sub-constable one moiety of the sum of thirty-five pounds two shillings and sixpence, and so for every fractional part of a year.

5. That where an additional constabulary force shall have been certified by the magistrates of any county, as now by law provided to be necessary for the due execution of the law within such county, and shall be appointed in conformity with such certificate, and also where an additional constabulary force shall be appointed for any borough under the provisions of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 106, the Lord Lieutenant, to appoint one sub-inspector for every fifty constables and sub-constables, and one head constable for every twenty-five constables and sub-constables, so appointed; and the expenses of such sub-inspectors and head constables shall be chargeable upon such county or borough, and be repaid by grand jury presentment, or from the borough fund, in the same manner as the expense of the constables and sub-constables who may have been so appointed.

6. ‘And whereas by 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 13, the inspector general is authorised, subject to the direction and control of the Lord Lieutenant, to direct that the whole or any number of the constabulary force of any county, county of a city, county of a town, or town and liberties, shall 'go and repair to any place or places in any other county or counties, or in any county of a city, or county of a town, or town and liberties: and whereas in the said act of the 9 & 10 Vict., the case of a portion of the force of one county temporarily sent by the inspector general into another county was not provided for: be it enacted, that whenever any officer or officers, head or other constable or constables, or sub-constable or constables, shall be ordered by the inspector general, to go and repair to any place or places in any county, county of a city, or county of a town, other than that to which he or they may belong, and shall be absent from his or their proper county or place more than five days, the county, county of a city, or county of a town to which he or they shall be so removed shall, in case the Lord Lieutenant shall so direct, be charged, at and after the rates herein-before specified, with a moiety of the expense of each such officer, head constable, or sub-constable during the period of his or their remaining in such county, county of a city, or county of a town; and the amount of such moiety shall be repaid by grand jury presentment, in like manner as any sums payable in respect of the constabulary force.

7. 'And whereas by an act of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 46, provision is made for the appointment and payment of additional head and other constables for keeping the peace in the neighbourhood of railway works or other public works in Ireland: be it enacted, that whenever such additional head or other constables shall have been or shall be employed for the purposes and under the provisions of the said last-recited act, the company or other parties carrying on such railway or other public works shall be chargeable for the expense of such head and other constables, but according to the proportion of head and other constables herein-before provided, and also according to the scale of charge herein-before provided for head and other constables, save that such company or parties shall be chargeable for the whole and not for the moiety only of such respective rates of charge.

8. 'And whereas by the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 13, the Inspector General is required to make out a certificate of the monies chargeable under the said act on each county, county of a city, county of a town, or any part of a county, specifying the force or service in respect whereof such charge may have been incurred, and transmit the same, when approved and certified by the chief or under secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, to the secretary of the grand jury for each county, county of a city, and county of a town, one week before each assizes and presenting term, who shall lay the same before the grand jury: and whereas doubts have arisen in some cases with respect to the sufficiency of certificates which have been laid before grand juries in pursuance of the said enactment, and it is expedient to provide a form of certificate which shall be sufficient in all cases: be it enacted, that the certificate to be transmitted by said inspector general, or by his deputies, to the secretary of the grand jury of any county, county of a city, or county of a town, before any assizes or presenting term, shall be made in the form contained in the schedule (B.) to this act annexed, or to the like effect, and shall not be required to state any further or other particulars than such as appear in the said form; and in case of there being no inspector general, or in case of his absence, any such certificate may be signed by one of the deputy inspectors general, and shall be of like validity.

9. That from and after the passing of this act the officers and men of the constabulary force shall have the same rights, powers, and authorities in and for each of the counties, counties of cities, and counties of towns immediately adjacent to that to which they may have been appointed, as if they had been appointed for such counties, counties of cities or counties of towns respectively.

10. 'And whereas by the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 13, it is enacted that the inspector general or deputy inspector general, or any other person or persons to be nominated for the purpose by the Lord Lieutenant, to examine on oath into the truth of any charges or complaints preferred against any person, of any neglect or violation of duty in his office: and whereas by the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 75, it is enacted, that

'all witnesses summoned by the inspector general or deputy inspector general, or person or persons nominated at any time by the Lord Lieutenant, shall, during their attendance at such inquiry, and in going to and returning from the same, be privileged from arrest; and that all persons so summoned who shall refuse to be sworn, or, being sworn, shall refuse to give evidence or to answer all such questions as may be legally demanded of them, shall forfeit and incur such penalty, not exceeding five pounds, as the said inspector general or deputy inspector general, or persons holding such inquiry, shall direct, and in default of payment thereof shall and may be imprisoned for such period, not exceeding one month, as such inspector general or deputy inspector general, or person or persons holding such inquiry, may direct and adjudge; be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act the assistant inspectors general (without any special appointment), or for any county inspector or sub-inspector who shall be appointed by the inspector general (or in his absence by one of his deputies) may be president of any court of inquiry into the truth of any charges or complaints preferred against any member of the said constabulary force of any neglect or violation of duty in his office, to examine on oath into the truth of such charges or complaints, and to summon any witness or witnesses on such inquiry, and to act in all respects in relation thereto as effectually as can be done under the said recited acts, by the inspector general or a deputy inspector general, or by any person nominated for the purpose of holding such inquiry, by the Lord Lieutenant; and the witnesses summoned to attend such inquiry shall have the same privilege from arrest, and shall be subject to the same penalties for false swearing, and for refusing to be sworn, or (being sworn) to give evidence, or to answer all such questions as may be legally demanded of them, as are provided in the said acts: provided, that if any fine or imprisonment shall be imposed by the president of any such court, or person or persons holding such inquiry, upon any person summoned to attend thereat, he or they shall forthwith specially report the same to the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland.

11. 'And whereas by the said act of the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 13, a certain oath is required to be taken by all persons appointed under the said act, and to be administered by any two magistrates: be it enacted, that after the passing of this act the said oath may be taken before and administered by one magistrate.

12. 'And whereas by the said act of the 6 & 7 W. 4, the Bank of Ireland is authorised to pay the drafts of the receiver only, countersigned by the inspector general or one of his deputies for constabulary services: and whereas the receiver may, from illness or absence on leave, be unable to draw such drafts: be it enacted, that the said receiver shall submit for the approval of the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury the name of a person to act for the said receiver during his illness or in his absence; and when the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury shall signify to him their approval of such person, the said commissioners shall notify the same to the inspector general and to the secretary of the Bank of Ireland, whereupon the governor and company of the Bank of Ireland may pay the drafts of the person so named and approved, to draw on the account of public monies for the said constabulary force; provided that the drafts of such person shall be countersigned by the inspector general, or by one of his deputies, and shall express whether they are drawn during the illness or absence of said receiver; and the said receiver and his sureties shall be, and they are hereby declared responsible for the act or acts of such person so authorised by such receiver to act in his behalf as aforesaid.

13. 'And whereas by an act of the 2 & 3 W. 4, c. 106, it was provided that in case any tumult, riot, or affray is apprehended, any two or more justices of the peace may appoint special constables: and whereas by the same act power is given to the justices, as therein mentioned, to issue orders on the treasurer of the county, county of the city, or county of the town in which such special constables shall have served, directing such treasurer to pay to the said special constables such allowance for their trouble, *loss of time and other expenses as they may deem fit :

 *and whereas doubts have arisen in some cases as to the *legality of such orders on the treasurer, in consequence of *their having been made payable to the clerks of the re*spective petty sessions : be it enacted, that any such orders drawn in the manner last mentioned, or to the like effect, shall be as good and valid as any such orders drawn as in the said act provided ; and that the grand jury of any county, county of a city, or county of a town in Ireland may present, without previous application to presentment sessions, to be raised off such county, county of a city, or county of a town, or any barony, half barony, townland, or other division or denomination of land, within which any such special constables may have served, the full amount of all sums paid by any such treasurer, whether such order or orders shall have been made in favour of each individual special constable, or in favour of the clerk of the petty sessions of the district in which such special constables may have acted, and whether such orders shall have been made either before or after the passing of this act ; and in case of such orders made in favour of the clerk of the petty sessions, such clerk shall duly pay over to such constables any monies received by him by virtue of such orders, and forward to the treasurer a receipt from each constable for the amount paid to him, and a certificate from the magistrates at petty sessions that such sums have been so paid by their order.

14. That the said recited act of the sixth year of the reign of His late Majesty King William the fourth, and the several acts in force amending the same, and this act, shall be construed as one act.

15. That the schedules to this act annexed shall be deemed part of this act.

16. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session.

DUBLIN, MARCH 24, 1849.

WHILE the advocates of the antagonising schemes for the relief of the Irish poor are urging arguments in favour of individualizing responsibility, on the one hand, or charging the support of the paupers of the South and West of Ireland on the industrious inhabitants of the North and East, on the other—from the fertile brain of Sir Robert Peel has sprung a proposition, which, from its vastness of conception, its tendency to roll back the flood of pauperism which threatens to overwhelm the whole island, and raise its blighted provinces to a prosperity which they never before enjoyed, is worthy of the sagacity and the renown of this statesman.

He proposes that Government, through the agency of a Commission, should get possession of the properties of the ruined landlords in the pauperized districts, on equitable terms, and arrange for their re-distribution, thus introducing new blood into Ireland, new enterprise, and a new division of property—a proposition by which every one interested would be advantaged,—the pauper, who would be employed and fed—the purchaser, who would be enabled to lay out his capital to advantage—the country, which would be relieved from the imposition of a rate in aid—and even the proprietor himself, who would thus have an opportunity of disposing of an estate which is unprofitable, and perhaps an incumbrance to him, on better terms than he could otherwise have hoped for.

To carry out this plan, the contemplated Commissioners must be armed with powers, not only to get possession of these properties on equitable terms, but to take it. Public money is generally considered in Ireland as fair game, and proprietors, dealing with the Government as a purchaser, would insist on extravagant terms; the very amount of pauperism and misery on their estates, crying loudly for relief or employment, would probably be insisted on as a reason why a larger price should be given; each proprietor would hold back, in the hope that he alone might be able to retain his property, which he might expect would be raised into prosperity again, by the attraction, as it were, of the surrounding country.

But how to discriminate between those properties which should thus be taken on equitable terms, and those which should not? This is a question which, though difficult, yet, we think, admits of solution on the following principles:—

The rate for the support of the poor is, under the present law, the first charge on property; its first duty is to supply means of existence to the population existing on its surface. In the Ballina union, instanced by Sir Robert Peel as a type of the Connaught Unions, according to the Report of Capt. Hamilton, 12s. 6d. in the £1, on the nominal value of the Union, would not be sufficient for the support of the poor for the year ending the 29th of September next, Lord John Russell, in his proposition, assigns 7s. 6d. in the £1 as a maximum, which the rate should not exceed, insisting, however, that to this extent, property shall contribute to the support of its poverty. Would it be unreasonable, then, to demand that properties which could not discharge this, their first liability, and that could not fulfil this their first duty to society, even to the limited extent of 7s. 6d. in the £1, if that sum were fixed on as a limit, should pass at once into other hands? If a proprietor have not the means of paying 7s. 6d. in the £1, towards the relief of the poor, it is clear he cannot have the means of cultivating his property and rendering it profitable to himself, or the means of support to his tenantry; and if it be intended to insist on the payment of 7s. 6d. in the £1, is it not better to test the solvency of the party at once? Is there any reason to suppose that he will be better able to pay at the end, than at the beginning of the year, especially if he have not the means to cultivate his property in the meantime? Is it just towards those provinces which are called upon to contribute to the support of pauperism in the distressed Unions, to allow fertile tracts of land to continue in the hands of parties, who not only cannot cultivate them, but who cannot pay even this limited amount of poor rate? For these reasons, we think that the payment of 7s. 6d. in the £1, or whatever other rate may be fixed upon as a maximum, should be adopted as a criterion of the capability of a party to hold land, and that on his failing to make this payment, the Government Commissioners should be empowered to enter into possession on equitable terms. In districts where properties are waste, and proprietors are beggars, poor-rate can only be levied by the sale of the estates themselves, and the more rapidly this crisis is hurried on, the more advantageous it will be for the owners, the occupiers, and for the country generally.

The owners of estates in the distressed districts will consider this plan confiscation, and a flagrant violation of the rights of property. However, if Captain Hamilton's Report be correct, they have very little to lose; and even if their sole source of hope, the potato, again succeeded, the country would not be placed in a much better condition. Captain Hamilton says—"I very much doubt whether the present real value of the Union, if exclusively devoted to the support of the poor, would prove sufficient for the next few years." And again—"Whether the future success of the potato crop would enable or induce the landlords to pay fair wages for fair work, is, I think, very doubtful. It appears to me more likely, the tendency would be rather to return to the old state of affairs, notwithstanding the bitter experience of the last three years."

However, we do not think that when Sir Robert Peel spoke of equitable terms, he meant to give proprietors no remuneration for their estates, because they are at present, and under the present system, of no value. Lord John Russell has proposed 7s. 6d. in the £1, as the maximum to which property should be taxed for poor-rate. If property remains in the hands of the present proprietors, there is every reason to conclude that this 7s. 6d. in the £1 would become a permanent tax on the distressed Unions; so that if the proposal of the Premier becomes law, it will diminish the value of property in these Unions by 7s. 6d. in the £1. If, then, it is considered reasonable to tax property to this amount, and if 20 years' purchase on its valuation be considered its gross value, would it be unreasonable to fix on 12½ years' purchase as an equitable price for the fee—thus giving the proprietor the full value of his estate, deducting merely the value of the poor-rate, supposed permanent? Of course, a further deduction should be made, in proportion to the quit rent, county rates, and rent charge to which the estate might be liable. We think that proprietors disposing of their properties, in their present condition, on terms such as these, could hardly complain of confiscation.

But should terms calculated on such principles as these not be considered equitable, there are precedents sufficient in the legal machinery at present in existence in the country, on whose model the value of the property which it might be deemed for the public advantage to take possession of, might be estimated.

Where land is required as a site for a jail or a poor-house, or for the construction of a railway the legislature have provided means, not only for getting possession of the land required, and for fixing the price to be paid, but have also provided, that in the transaction no interest shall be prejudiced. Is the necessity less in the present instance, or the urgency less pressing? And if it is just, on public grounds, to take possession of land for such purposes, on equitable terms, how could it be considered unjust to follow the same course, when the very being of the country depends on it? If it has not been found impossible to protect vested and contingent interests in the one case, why should it not be possible to do so likewise in the other? It should not be forgotten, either, that in the one case a man may be forced to part with a portion of his house, his garden, or his demesne, on fair terms, no matter how inconvenient or annoying it might be to him; whilst in the latter case he could select what portion of his estate he would retain, and what portion he would part with, keeping those portions which are convenient and profitable, and parting with those which might be distant and expensive, or difficult to manage.

It may be objected, what will become of mortgages and other incumbrances? Are they to be entirely overlooked in the arrangement? and how is the Government to raise funds to make these purchases which would possibly embrace a great part of the provinces of Connaught and Munster?

As to the extent to which the charges on property would be restored to creditors, the proposition of Sir Robert Peel, we apprehend, would make no alteration. If property is permanently charged with 7s. 6d. in the £1 for poor-rate, it would bring in the market but five-eighths of the price it would bring if not so charged; and if this purchase-money were invested in the public funds, where it would remain liable to these charges in the same way that the property itself was, we are of opinion that the position of the incumbrancer would be improved—he would obtain the value of an estate, calculated on principles most favourable to the owner, as a security, in exchange for the estate itself, which, if not purchased in this way, would soon be altogether valueless.

As to raising the necessary funds, it must be remembered that the Government would not be called upon to pay the principal of the purchase-money, at least in the first instance. They would only have to guarantee the payment of its interest. This might be provided for at first by an income, or any other tax, and would be paid eventually out of the properties purchased themselves, which, as they were re-disposed of by the Commissioners, would gradually liquidate the whole debt. The Government would, in fact, take the properties, as it were, at a rent, which they would guarantee the payment of—the property itself remaining the security for the principal of the purchase-money, and which would be ultimately discharged by the re-sale of the estates.

The great advantage of the proposition is, that it would prevent the enormous sums which must be expended for the relief of the poor, from being, as hitherto, utterly lost. The application of pauper labour to the estates—thus become public property—would render them more valuable in the market; every pauper who would become self-supporting would enhance their value; the returning—the very prospect of returning prosperity would have the same effect; and instead of an income or other tax, which would be perpetual, and whose tendency would be to increase, once entailed upon the country, the public might look forward to have, at the close of the transaction, not only prosperity restored to the country, but a considerable balance carried to the credit of the national account.

In a former number (ante, page 147), we considered the question, whether any covenant in law arose from the relation of landlord and tenant, there being no contract under seal. We now propose to consider, whether a similar contract of demise creates any implied covenant as to the fitness of the land for any particular purpose.

In considering this question, the distinction we have already adverted to between covenants in law and implied covenants, must be borne in mind. In this case, no covenant in law, as to fitness, arises from the mere relation of landlord and tenant; but an implied covenant to that effect may, we think, sometimes be created by the acts of the contracting parties. The general rule respecting the purchase of chattels is, that where the purchaser himself has had an opportunity of inspecting the thing bought, and forming an opinion thereon, no implied warranty of fitness will arise, Olivant v. Bayley (5 Q. B. 288). But if the purchaser informs the vendor that the subject of the purchase is for a specified purpose, and for no other, as where a purchaser desired to be furnished with a rope adapted to raise pipes of wine from a cellar, (Brown v. Edgington, 2 M. & G. 279) it was held that there was an implied warranty on the part of the vendor that the rope furnished would suit that purpose.

These rules are equally applicable to the sale of chattels real; but the courts, in the application of them, have, in some instances, adopted a distinction, the applicability of which, we confess, we do not comprehend, and which, if followed, will cause much hardship and inconvenience.

In the case of Smith v. Marables (11 M. & W. 5), the defendant took a furnished house at a watering place; the house was uninhabitable (being filled with bugs), and it was held that the lessee was not liable for the rent during the period for which he had contracted to take the premises. This case was the subject of much discussion in two very recent cases, Sutton v. Temple (12 M. & W. 64), and Harte v. Windsor (12 M. & W. 68), and was upheld on the ground of its being a letting of a furnished house—not of real estate merely—taken on the faith of its being fit for immediate habitation.

The case of Sutton v. Temple was a lease of aftermath. The agreement was for “twenty-four acres of eddish (aftergrass) from the 8th of September to the 6th of April.” The cattle died from the effects of refuse paint which had been spread upon the land, whereon the defendant gave up the farm, and the plaintiff brought this action for the sum agreed to be paid for the whole term. There was no evidence that the plaintiff was aware of the state of the pasture. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The general proposition stated by the court in their judgment in this case, that no implied covenant can in any case arise from a mere demise of land, is one which, we contend, cannot be sustained in its integrity. The rule of law, as laid down by Lord Abinger, C.B., “that if a party contract for the use and occupation of land for a specified time, and at a specified rent, he is bound by that bargain, even though he took it for a particular purpose, and that purpose be not attained,” is one not likely to be questioned. But if a person requiring land, or a house, furnished or unfurnished, say to another, “I want such for a particular purpose,” naming it, and that other person agrees to give the thing required, and the thing purchased be wholly unfit for the intended purpose, it would appear contrary to the plainest principles of justice that the purchaser should be compelled to pay. An implied covenant that the thing sold is fit for its intended use, appears plainly to arise from the fact of the vendor’s having agreed to give it for that purpose, and for this position the case of Smith v. Marable—a decision the validity of which cannot now be doubted—is, we submit, a direct authority. It is observable that the opinions of all the learned judges in Sutton v. Temple were based on the ground that the letting was of land in its then existing state, in which case the plaintiff was undoubtedly entitled to recover. The nature and substance of the contract would, however, seem to shew that it was a purchase of the pasturage, and nothing else; and unless there were other circumstances not reported, it would seem justice that the defendant should be as much entitled to have good eddish for his cattle, as he would, had he hired particular goods, be entitled to be furnished with the requisite articles. In Isod v. Gorton (5 Bing. N. C. 501), the premises being held from year to year, the court decided that their being burned did not put an end to the tenancy, and that the tenant was therefore liable. In Arden v. Pullen (10 M. & W. 327), the premises became uninhabitable for want of proper sewerage, and the tenant, notwithstanding, was held to be liable during the period of his tenancy; and Collins v. Barrow (1 M. & Rob. 112), to the contrary, was denied to be law. In each of these cases, the premises were, at the time they were first occupied, fit for the purposes required of them; and it could never be successfully contended, that subsequent circumstances rendering them unfit for habitation, could relieve the tenant of his liability during the continuation of his term.

In Windsor v. Harte (12 M. & W. 68), the demise was of a house and garden ground. The facts shew that no statement of the purpose for which they were required, nor inquiry as to the fitness of the premises for that purpose was made; it was a purchase of the premises in their then state; and, in accordance with the rule as stated by Lord Abinger in Sutton v. Temple, it was held, that there was no implied warranty of fitness.

These cases, we submit, are not authorities against the inference deducible from Smith v. Marables. There is no case to be found, except Sutton v. Temple, where the parties had contracted with an understanding as to the purpose for which the premises were taken, and which, ab initio, were found to be useless to the purchaser; all the cases were either where the purchase was of the land in its existing state, from which no covenant in law, and, a fortiori, no implied covenant arose; or where, if there existed any covenant, express or implied, as to capability, the purchaser having gone into possession and raised no objection, had been compelled to leave from subsequent circumstances.

The next question on this branch of the law, to which we propose to call the attention of our readers is, whether a tenant for years is liable for permissive waste, that is, more than the natural wear and tear arising from the use of the premises.

This question, though on several occasions before the courts of law at Westminster, has never received any determination. In the most recent case on the subject, Harnett v. Maitland, (16 M. & W. 257, S. C. 16; L. Jou. 134, N. S. Ex.) this question was fully argued; the case however was determined on the pleadings, the declaration being held bad on demurrer, as it did not thereby appear whether the defendant was tenant for years or at will, and in the latter case he would not be liable. But the opinion of Parke, B. appears to be in favour of the affirmative; Martin v. Gilham (7 Ad. & E. 540, S. C. 2 Nev. & P. 568); was also decided upon, a defect in the declaration which charged the tenant with using the land in an "unhusbandlike manner;" which, in the opinion of the court, precluded the plaintiff from recovering for permissive waste. In Beale v. Sanders, (3 Bing. N.C. S.C. 5 Scott. 58), the court held, that a tenant under a void lease containing a covenant to repair, was a tenant from year to year, under the terms of the lease, and was liable for permissive waste. In Jones v. Hill, (7 Taunt. 332), the court expressly declined giving any opinion; holding that a tenant from year to year was not bound to keep the premises precisely in the order he got them, that there should be some allowance for wear and tear, Gibson v. Wells, (1 N.R. 290), was the case of a tenancy at will. Young v. Torriano, (6 Car & P. 12), is the only case where the non-liability of a tenant for years is stated in direct terms.

Before the statutes of Gloucester and Marlebridge, no action of waste lay against a tenant for years (3 Inst. 302). In the cases in which this question was raised, it was contended that the liability thereby created was for commissive waste alone, the words being "qui facient vastum." Lord Coke (Litt. 53, a, chap. 7, Tenant for Years), after stating the several kinds of waste, voluntary, actual, and permissive, says, that "waste may be done in houses, by pulling or prostrating them, or by suffering the same to be uncovered, whereby the rafters or other timbers are rotted. The latter would seem to mean a permissive waste, and many of the examples given are permissive, as is shewn by the word "suffer," which here means to permit; as where he says, "to suffer the pale to decay, whereby the deer is dispersed, is waste," (ib. 53, a); and it is waste to suffer a wall of the sea to be in decay, (ib. 53, a), seem all to be instances of permissive waste.

In the case of Corbett v. Stonehouse (2 Roll. Ab. 816), it was adjudged, and affirmed on appeal, that an action of waste lies for permitting the walls of messuages to be in decay and unrepaired for default of daubing and plastering. In Pomfret v. Ricraft (1 Saund. 323, d, note by Williams) and Greene v. Cole (2 Saund. 252, c, ed. 1845) the reporter gives a precedent of a declaration for permissive waste against a tenant for years. From these authorities, it would seem to be the better opinion, that an action for permissive waste will lie against a tenant for years.

CAP. LXXIV.

An act to authorize the lords of council and session to regulate the rates or dues of registration to be charged by the keepers of the registers of sasines, reversions, &c. in Scotland. [31st August, 1848.]

CAP. LXXV.

An act to defray until the 1st of August, 1849, the charge of the pay, clothing, and contingent and other expenses of the disembodied militia in Great Britain and Ireland; to grant allowances in certain cases to subaltern officers, adjutants, paymasters, quartermasters, surgeons, assistant surgeons, surgeons mates, and serjeant majors of the militia; and to authorize the employment of the non-commissioned officers. [31st August, 1848.]

CAP. LXXVI.

An act to enable archbishops and bishops and other persons in Ireland to compromise suits touching their rights of patronage as to ecclesiastical benefices, in certain cases. [31st August, 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Power to archbishops and bishops in Ireland to compromise conflicting claims to patronage of advowsons.
2. Parties to provide by the terms of such compromise the rights to certain patronage.
 3. Where compromise carried into effect, an instrument in writing containing terms of the same shall be lodged in the council office of Dublin castle. If Lord Lieutenant, &c. approve of compromise, parties may obtain an order from Common Pleas to carry the same into effect.
 4. Incumbents to retain possession notwithstanding compromise.
 5. As to payment of expenses of compromise.
 6. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27-33, and by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 54, it was further enacted, that after the 1st of January, 1844, the several clauses and enactments in the said first-mentioned act, relating to any right to present to any ecclesiastical benefice, should extend to Ireland, as fully as if the said clauses were thereby repeated, and it was by the said last-mentioned act further enacted, that the said last-mentioned act should not be prejudicial or available to or for any plaintiff or defendant in any action or suit already commenced, relating to any right to present to any ecclesiastical benefice in Ireland: and whereas in consequence of the said acts actions of quare impedit have been brought, and are now depending, for the purpose of determining the right of presentation to divers ecclesiastical benefices in Ireland, by persons whose right would have been barred by the provisions of the aforesaid acts: and whereas numerous actions and proceedings have been brought and are now pending against archbishops and bishops in Ireland for the recovery of advowsons and rights of presentation to ecclesiastical benefices and preferments in their dioceses, the patronage whereof has been for long and uninterrupted periods exercised by them and their predecessors in right of their sees, and the said archbishops and bishops have been and will be put to heavy expenses in defending, in the said actions and proceedings, their rights of patronage: and whereas by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 51, it was enacted, that archbishops and bishops might, charge the expenses of defending their rights of patronage on their respective sees, and that plaintiffs in quare impedit, under family settlement or otherwise entitled to a life estate or other limited interest in the rights of presentation to the ecclesiastical benefices to recover which the said writs have been sued out, might, under certain restrictions, charge the expenses incurred by them in prosecuting such claims upon the estates of those who would be entitled in remainder to such rights of presentation: and whereas the prosecution of such suits is attended with very great expense, and the possession of the present incumbents of many of the said benefices is insecure, and it is expedient, for the purpose of avoiding expense, and quieting the possession of incumbents in their benefices, to enable archbishops and bishops, and persons who, under family settlements or otherwise, would only be entitled to a life estate or other limited interest in such rights of presentation, to compromise their claims to the patronage of such ecclesiastical benefices: be it enacted, that any archbishop or bishop in Ireland who may be a defendant in any action of quare impedit or other action, and who may claim the ecclesiastical benefice which is the subject of such suit, for and on behalf of himself and successors, and for any person or persons by whom or on whose behalf any such writ of quare impedit has been sued out, and who, under family settlement or otherwise, would only be entitled to a life estate or other limited interest in the advowson to recover which such writ has been sued out only on behalf of themselves, and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, but also on behalf of every person entitled in reversion, remainder, or expectancy after them, or in defeasance of the estate of such parties, may compromise their conflicting claims to any such advowson or advowsons.

2. That the said parties in such case may provide by the terms of any such compromise that any particular advowson or advowsons or right or rights of patronage of or to any ecclesiastical benefice or benefices in Ireland shall belong absolutely to any archbishop or bishop and his successors, in consideration of such archbishop or bishop, agreeing that any other advowson or advowsons, right or rights of patronage to any other ecclesiastical benefice or benefices in Ireland, shall belong to any such person or persons as aforesaid, according to such estate or interest as he, she, or they may respectively claim therein, under family settlement or otherwise, or for the parties to such compromise to provide that the alternate right or rights of presentation or patronage to any such ecclesiastical benefice or benefices shall belong to any archbishop or bishop and his successors on the one hand, and on the other to any person or persons, according to such estate or interest as he, she, or they may respectively be entitled to, under family settlement or otherwise, or to make any other arrangement or provision respecting any advowson or advowsons, right or rights of patronage, for the recovery of which suits are now pending, which may by them respectively be deemed proper and expedient.

3. That where any such compromise is to be carried into effect a writing containing the terms of such compromise, and in the case of a bishop being a defendant having endorsed upon such instrument the approbation of the archbishop entitled to exercise archiepiscopal jurisdiction in the province in which the parish or parishes the subject of such compromise is or are situate, or in case any archbishop shall be a defendant having endorsed thereon the approbation of Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland, shall be lodged in the council office of Dublin Castle, and thereupon the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland or at least six of the privy council to take such instrument into consideration, and to make an order approving or disapproving of such compromise; and in case such compromise shall be approved the parties, upon the production of a copy of such order before the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, may proceed to have such compromise carried into effect by a rule or order of such court, to be made upon consent of the parties hereby enabled to enter into such compromise, and (if required by the said court) upon affidavit or affidavits of such facts and circumstances as the said court may require; and every such rule or order shall, be conclusive evidence of the title of the person or persons thereby declared to be the patron or patrons of every such advowson or advowsons.

4. That every such compromise shall provide that every incumbent in possession of any ecclesiastical benefice at the time of the passing of this act shall hold the same as if he had been presented or collated thereto by the true and undoubted patron, notwithstanding that by such compromise it shall be agreed that the advowsons of the benefice whereof such incumbent is in possession shall belong to any person or persons other than the person or persons by whom such incumbent shall have been presented.

5. That the costs and expenses of such compromise incurred shall be charged by the said archbishop and bishop, and by said tenants for life, or other person or persons having limited estates or interest, in such manner and form as is provided by said recited act of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 51.

6. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. LXXVII.

An act to authorize the application of part of the unclaimed money in the court for the relief of insolvent debtors in enlarging the court house of the said court.

[31st August, 1848.]

CAP. LXXVIII.

An Act for the further amendment of the administration of the criminal law.

[31st August, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Questions of law may be reserved at sessions of the peace for consideration of judges.

2. Questions reserved to be certified to the judges.

3. Quorum of judges; their judgments to be delivered in open court.

4. Case or certificate may be sent back for amendment.

5. When judgment is reversed on writ of error, record may be remitted to court below for judgment.

6. Penalty for forgery.

7. Act not to extend to Scotland.

8. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas it is expedient to provide a mode of deciding difficult questions of law arising in criminal trials in any Court of Oyer and Terminer and Gaol Delivery, and to make amendments in the criminal law; be it enacted, that when any person shall have been convicted of any treason, felony, or misdemeanour, before any Court of Oyer and Terminer or Gaol Delivery, or Court of Quarter Sessions, the judge or commissioner or justices of the peace before whom the case shall have been tried may reserve any question of law which shall have arisen on the trial for the consideration of the justices of either bench and barons of the exchequer, and thereupon shall have authority to respite execution of this judgment, or postpone it until such question shall have been decided, and in either case the court shall commit the person convicted to prison, or shall take a recognizance of bail, with one or two sufficient sureties, and in such sum as the court shall think fit, conditioned to appear at such time or times as the court shall direct, and receive judgment, or to render himself in execution.

2. That the judge or commissioner or Court of Quarter Sessions shall state, in a case signed in the manner now usual, the question or questions of law so reserved, with the special circumstances upon which the same shall have arisen; and such case shall be transmitted to the said justices and barons; and the said justices and barons shall have full power and authority to hear and finally determine the said question or questions, and thereupon to reverse, affirm, or amend any judgment given on the indictment or inquisition on the trial whereof such question or questions have arisen, or to avoid such judgment, and to order an entry to be made on the record, that in the judgment of the said justices and barons the party ought not to have been convicted, or to arrest the judgment, or order judgment to be given thereon at some other session of Oyer and Terminer or gaol delivery, or other sessions of the peace, if no judgment shall have been before that time given, or to make such other order as justice may require; and such judgment and order of the said justices and barons shall be certified under the hand of the presiding chief justice or chief baron to the clerk of assize or his deputy, or to the clerk of the peace or his deputy, who shall enter the same on the original record; and a certificate of such entry, under the hand of the clerk of assize or his deputy, or the clerk of the peace or his deputy, in the form or to the effect mentioned in the schedule to this Act, with the necessary alterations to adapt it to the circumstances of the case, shall be delivered or transmitted to the sheriff or gaoler in whose custody the person convicted shall be: and the said certificate shall be a sufficient warrant to such sheriff or gaoler, and all other persons, for the execution of the judgment, and execution shall be thereupon executed on such judgment, and for the discharge of the person convicted from further imprisonment, if the judgment shall be reversed, and in that case such sheriff or gaoler shall discharge him, and also the next court of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery or sessions of the peace shall vacate the recognisance of bail, if any; and if the court of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery or court of quarter sessions shall be directed to give judgment, the said court shall proceed to give judgment at the next session.

3. That the jurisdiction by this act given to the said justices of either bench and Barons of the Exchequer may be exercised by the said justices and barons, or five of them at the least, of whom the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, or one of such chiefs at least shall be part; and the judgment or judgments of the said justices and barons shall be delivered in open court, after hearing counsel or the parties, in case the prosecutor or the person convicted shall think it fit that the case shall be argued, in like manner as the judgments of the superior courts of common law are now delivered.

4. That the said justices and barons, when a case has been reserved for their opinion, shall have power to cause the case or certificate to be sent back for amendment, and thereupon the same shall be amended, and judgment shall be delivered after it shall have been amended.

5. That whenever any writ of error shall be brought upon any judgment on any indictment, information, presentment, or inquisition, in any criminal case, and the court of Error shall reverse the judgment, it shall be competent for such court of Error either to pronounce the proper judgment or to remit the record to the court below, in order that such court may pronounce the proper judgment.

6. That every person who shall forge or alter, or shall offer, knowing the same to be forged or altered, any certificate of or copy certified by a chief justice, or any certificate of or copy certified by a clerk of assize or his deputy, or the clerk of the peace or his deputy, with intent to cause any person to be discharged from custody, or otherwise prevent the due course of justice, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, to be transported beyond the seas for any term not exceeding ten years, or be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years, with or without hard labour and solitary confinement, at the discretion of the court before which he shall be tried.

7. That this act shall not extend to Scotland.

8. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed during this present session of parliament.

SCHEDULE.

Whereas at the session of the peace for the county of held on before and others their fellows, [or at the session of Oyer and Terminer and gaol delivery held for the county of on before, among others, Sir A. B. Knight, one of the justices of the court of and here name the quorum commissioners, justices of Oyer and gaol delivery.] A. B., late of Labourer, having been found guilty of felony, and judgment thereupon given, that [state the substance,] the court before whom he was tried reserved a certain question of law for the consideration of the justices of either bench and the Barons of the Exchequer, and execution was thereupon respite in the meantime:

This is to certify, that the said Justices and Barons having met in the Exchequer Chamber at Westminster [or Dublin, as the case may be,] on the day of it was considered by the said Justices and Barons there that the judgment aforesaid should be annulled, and an entry made on the record, that the said A. B. ought not, in the judgment of the said justices and barons, to have been convicted of the felony aforesaid; and you are therefore hereby required forthwith to discharge the said A. B. from your custody.

To the gaoler of and the sheriff of and all others whom it may concern. (Signed) E. F.

Clerk of the peace for the county of [or, clerk of assize for as the case may be.]

CAP. LXXIX.

An act to facilitate and simplify procedure in the court of justiciary in Scotland. [31st August, 1843.]

CAP. LXXX.

An act to empower lessees of tithe rent-charge in Ireland to deduct a proportion of poor-rate poundage from rent; and also to empower the ecclesiastical commissioners in Ireland to allow sums paid for poor-rate or county cess, or poundage deducted from ecclesiastical persons on account of poor-rate, among their deductions from the valuation of ecclesiastical property directed to be made under an act of the third and fourth years of his late majesty, for the purpose of a certain tax thereby imposed upon such property in Ireland. [31st August, 1843.]

Sec. 1. Lessee of tithe rent-charge, if liable to pay rate therefor, may deduct proportion of rate.

2. Ecclesiastical commissioners under 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 37, shall include poor-rate, &c. in deduction from valuation.

3. Successors of archbishop of Armagh and bishop of Derry may deduct from money to be paid to ecclesiastical commissioners a certain sum on account of poor-rate, &c.

4. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, it is enacted, that 'where any person receiving rent in respect of any rateable property shall also pay a rent in respect of the same, he shall be entitled to deduct from such rent a proportion of the rate deducted from him, and it is expedient to extend such provision to the case of tithe rent-charge: be it enacted, that after the passing of this act, where any person entitled to receive tithe rent-charge shall be liable to pay a rent in respect of the same, he shall be entitled to deduct from the rent so paid by him a sum bearing such a proportion to one half the amount of rate deducted from the tithe rent-charge received by him as the rent paid by him in respect of such tithe rent-charge bears to the tithe rent-charge which he is so entitled to receive.

2. And whereas by 3 & 4 W. 4. c. 37, the ecclesiastical commissioners therein appointed were authorized to 'make a valuation of all ecclesiastical property, and to take, levy, and receive therefrom a yearly tax, rate, or assessment computed and imposed upon such valuation according to the scale and for the purposes recited in the said act: and whereas doubts have arisen whether the said commissioners are authorized to allow among the deductions therein set forth any sums paid for county cess or poor-rate, or poundage deducted for poor-rate, and it is expedient that such doubts be removed: be it enacted, that after the passing of this act the said commissioners, in and from the valuation made or to be made of any ecclesiastical property for the purpose of imposing the rate, tax, or assessment required by the said act, in addition to the charges specified as deductions in the said act, may deduct such amounts or sum as the said commissioners shall ascertain as proper to be deducted from such valuation, for or on account of any county cess or poor-rate, or poundage rate for the refor employment of the poor, or for repaying any advances made for those purposes, and paid or payable or deducted in respect of such ecclesiastical property, such deduction by the said commissioners to be made according to a return of the county cess paid in respect of such property, and of the rate struck in the electoral division or divisions within which such property may be situate, during the half year ending on the first day of January or first day of July respectively preceding the half year for which such ecclesiastical tax shall be demanded.

3. 'And whereas said last-recited act, the successor to the present archbishop of Armagh, and the present bishop of Derry, and his and their successors for ever, are bound, out of the revenues of the said archbishopric and bishoprick respectively, to pay to the ecclesiastical commissioners for Ireland, half-yearly, sums in the said act specified, and it is but just that such persons so paying such annuity be empowered to deduct an allowance for poor-rate: be it enacted, that the successor of the present archbishop of Armagh, and the present bishop of Derry, and his or their successors in such sees respectively, shall be entitled to deduct from the sum to be paid by him to the ecclesiastical commissioners for Ireland such amount or sum as the commissioners shall ascertain as proper to be deducted for or on account of any poor-rate, and paid or payable or deducted in respect of ecclesiastical property by the tenants of such see, such deduction to bear the same proportion to the entire poundage for poor-rate allowed in such half year to his tenants by such archbishop or bishop as the said half-yearly annuity bears to the rent and fines received by such archbishop or bishop in such half year.

4. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. LXXXI.

An act for the further regulation of steam navigation, and for limiting in certain cases the number of passengers to be conveyed in steam vessels. [31st August, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Penalty for delay in transmitting certificates required by recited act.

2. Board of trade may insert in certificate a notice of the number of passengers steam vessels are constructed to carry. Penalty for carrying a greater number than specified in certificate.

3. Copy of certificate to be placed in a conspicuous part of vessel. Penalty for neglect.

4. Penalty on persons, having been refused admission, forcing their way on board when vessels are full, &c.

5. Penalty on persons refusing or neglecting to pay their fares, or quit vessels, &c.

6. Penalties how to be recovered and applied.

7. Nothing to affect privileges of corporation of London.

8. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 100, it is enacted, that on or before the 30th of April, and 31st of October in every year the owners of every steam vessel shall transmit to the Lords of the Privy Council for trade two declarations, and that said lords shall register such declarations, and shall transmit to the owners of such steam vessels respectively certificates of the registry, and that if any steam vessel proceed to sea with passengers, the owner whereof has not so transmitted such declarations and received such certificates of the registry thereof, the owner of such steam vessel shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred pounds: and whereas it is expedient to make provision for compelling the owners of steam vessels to transmit such declarations to the said lords whether such steam vessels be intended to proceed to sea or not: be it enacted, that in case the owner or owners of any steam vessel, not excepted from said act, neglect to transmit to the lords of the said committee, the declarations in writing by the said act prescribed, the owner or owners of every such steam vessel shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten shillings for every day such declarations is delayed, unless such delay be accounted for: provided that the owners of all steam vessels (not being excepted as aforesaid) in respect of which any declarations required as aforesaid have not been transmitted to the said committee shall transmit the same on or before the twentieth day of September next.

2. 'And whereas much inconvenience and danger has been found to result from the over-crowding of steam vessels, and it is expedient to prevent such; be it enacted, that the lords of the said committee, may insert into any certificate granted by them in conformity with the provisions of the said act a notice of the number of passengers which the vessel is constructed to carry, and whenever such notice shall have been so inserted such vessel shall not at any time have on board any greater number of passengers than the number specified in the certificate last received from the said committee; and in case any such vessel shall have on board any greater number, the owner or owners, or the master or other person having charge thereof, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding five shillings for every passenger above the number so specified.

3. That the owner or owners of every steam vessel shall cause a true copy of the certificate which they have last received from the lords of the said committee to be put up in some conspicuous part of the vessel, where the same shall be visible to the passengers on board, and if they neglect to do so they shall for every offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds.

4. That if any person, after having been refused admission into any steam vessel by the owner or owners, or any person in the employ of the owner or owners thereof on account of such steam vessel being full, and after having had the full amount of his fare returned or tendered to him, shall persist in attempting to enter the same, or if any person having got on board any steam vessel be requested to leave such steam vessel before the same has quitted the place at which such person got on board, and shall refuse to do so, after having had the full amount of his fare returned or tendered to him, then such person shall for such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding five shillings.

5. That if any person travel or attempt to travel in any steam vessel which has been duly surveyed without having previously paid his or her fare, and with intent to avoid payment, or if any person, having paid his or her fare for a certain distance, proceed in any such vessel beyond such distance without previously paying the additional fare, or if any person refuse or neglect, on arriving at the point to which he has paid his fare, to quit such vessel, every such person shall forfeit to the owner or owners of such steam vessel a sum not exceeding five shillings.

6. That the penalties and forfeitures by this act imposed shall be sued for, recovered and applied in like manner as the penalties and forfeitures imposed by the said recited act are therein directed to be sued for, recovered, and applied, except as is hereby otherwise directed.

7. That nothing in this act contained shall prejudice or derogate the rights of the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the city of London.

8. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. LXXXVII.

An act to extend the provisions of an act passed in the first year of his late Majesty King William the fourth, intituled an act for consolidating and amending the laws for facilitating the payment of debts out of real estate.

[31st August, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Recited provision to extend to lands, &c. of a deceased debtor, in certain cases.

2. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by the 11 G. 4, & 1 W. 4, c. 47, it was (amongst other things) enacted, that where any lands, tenements, or hereditaments had been or should be devised in settlement by any person or persons whose estate should be liable to the payment of any of his or their debts, and by such demise should be vested in any person or persons or life or other limited interest, with any remainder, limitation, or gift over which might not be vested, or might be vested in some person or persons from whom a conveyance could not be obtained, or by way of executory devise, and a decree should be made for the sale thereof for the payment of such debts, the court by whom such decree should be made might direct any such tenant for life, &c., to convey, surrender, or otherwise assure the fee simple or other interest to the purchaser or purchasers, or in such manner as the said court should think proper; and every such conveyance, or other assurance should be as effectual as if the person who should make the same were seised or possessed of the fee simple or other whole estate so to be sold: and whereas the herein-before recited provision does not extend to the case of lands, tenements, or hereditaments of a deceased debtor which are by descent or otherwise than by devise vested in the heir or co-heirs of such debtor, subject to an executory devise over in favour of a person or persons not existing or not ascertained, and it is expedient that the said act should be extended: be it therefore enacted that the said recited provision of the said act shall extend and is extended to any case in which any lands, tenements, or hereditaments of any deceased person shall by descent or otherwise than by devise be vested in the heir or co-heirs of such persons, subject to an executory devise over in favour of a person or persons not existing or not ascertained; and in such case the court in the said provision may direct such heir or co-heirs, notwithstanding such heir or co-heirs, or any of them, may be an infant or infants, to convey, or otherwise assure the fee simple or other interest to the purchaser or purchasers, as the said court shall think proper; and every such conveyance, or other assurance shall be as effectual as if the heir or co-heirs who shall make and execute the same was or were seised or possessed of the fee simple or other whole estate so to be sold, and, if an infant or infants, was or were of full age.

2. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed during this present session of parliament.

DUBLIN, MARCH 31, 1849.

We resume this week the consideration of a subject to which we have already called attention. We are so impressed with the importance of advocating a change in the system of managing estates placed under the control of our Courts of Equity, that we shall not slacken our exertions until we see some practical measure carried into effect for the redress of an universally-admitted national evil.

We have shewn that no doubt exists, in all quarters, of the defectiveness of the present system of receiverships, and we have not done this for the idle object of pointing out grievances, but because we knew that practical and intelligent heads were at work to improve that system, and we were anxious to lend our humble efforts to promote a useful measure of law reform.

When an estate is placed under the Court of Chancery, the ad interim ownership is vested in it, ostensibly for the benefit of the creditor, but that benefit is not what it is capable of being made, and certainly it is to the loss of the owner, the injury of the occupier, and of the country generally. It is not difficult to prove these propositions seriatim.

1st. The creditor is not benefitted to the extent he might be; in other words, the court does not do for him one-half that, which under better management, it might do.

The question as to him is a pure money one: he cannot get his money without the aid of the court, through that aid he gets it slowly, expensively, and unsatisfactorily. Every one knows this as a matter of fact; it is not a mere vague generality, it is true in particular and detail. Let us test the fact.

Suppose a year's interest due to a mortgagee; the mortgagor cannot, or will not pay it—applications by principal and solicitor are made ineffectually—a bill becomes necessary, and is filed—the mortgagee, like Tantalus siliens, lives in expectation that he will soon receive his interest. But, no; a little patience. The answer admitting the justice of your claim must be put in, for which it is not unreasonable to allow three months—the court says two—after appearance; but, in addition to this period, there is the time lost in enforcing appearance, and answer after appearance. Making allowance for vacations and the reluctance to be too sharp on a defendant, we are satisfied more than three months, on the average, is consumed between the time of filing the bill and the filing of the answer. It is then necessary to consider whether its admissions be sufficient to justify an application for a receiver, as the motion rests on Equity confessed in the answer. Assume that they are sufficient, some time must elapse before the application is heard, and after it has been heard, before the order is taken out and the reference carried before the Master—then used to come the contest for the appointment. We do not suppose there is much competition now, as the office has lately not been very desirable; and there is, also, the delay of the receiver perfecting his own recognizance and requiring his sureties to perfect theirs. The court thinks it but fair, also, to give him ample time to make himself acquainted with the property; he has to be furnished with a rental by the mortgagor, who withholds it as long as possible, and then returns “no arrears,” having used his utmost diligence (from the moment the bill has been filed until the day notice of the appointment of the receiver has been served on the tenants) to collect their arrears, taking as much money as he can procure; when that is exhausted, taking the rent in kind, corn, and cattle, and, as a premium for prompt payment, giving receipts in full.

The receiver need not pass his first account until he has been fifteen months appointed; and even that time may, by judicious management, be extended a little. His costs form the first lien on the fund, and he has, after deducting them, three weeks to invest the balance appearing on his account. By the time the creditor applies for that balance—if he be in a position to do so—by having a decree, or an undisputed priority, we are under the mark in fixing a year and nine months from the period of filing the bill until he touches a shilling of interest, the arrears of which have thus swelled to two years and nine months.

This, we say, is the ordinary practice of the court. We are quite aware that the present Master of the Rolls, to mitigate this evil, in cases where the right is clear, makes prospective orders on receivers to pay moneys as they come to their hands, but in the majority of cases, such orders are not made, or capable of being made; and if made, in some degree may be baffled by the receiver, as it cannot be tested that he has money in his hands until his account be passed.

Now, we pause here to re-state our proposition, that the creditor is not benefitted as he might be by the jurisdiction of the court, which, let it be observed, has been set in motion by and for him; he receives his money slowly, expensively, and unsatisfactorily, one year and nine months from the time he sought the aid of the court. During this long interval he gets no interest upon interest; he is out of his money, he can turn to no profitable purpose that fund which he might have made reproductive for himself, and with benefit to the country, and which the court does not render fructifying either for him or any one else, except it may be the receiver, who is precisely the only person for whose interest no responsibility devolves upon it. Thus the creditor and the country suffer alike.

We have restricted our observations to the economic view of the question, but the social ills, the family sufferings which are entailed by postponed payments are incalculable and grievous. "Bis dat qui cito dat," has never been the motto of a Court of Equity.

Now we have shewn a mischief which is obviously capable of amendment—so far as the preliminary steps necessary to place the property under the control of the court are concerned, the acceleration of them may be accomplished without the interference of the legislature, by new general orders which the Chancellor and Master of the Rolls have power, from time to time, to make; but for the due management of the property now under its care, the assistance of the legislature is requisite. There is no difficulty in having officers of the court to receive the rents, and have them invested so as to fructify from the moment of their collection.

We refrain, at present, from entering into further detail on this branch of the subject, not from the inability or difficulty of doing so, but because we do not think it right to forestall a carefully organized plan which has been prepared by a competent hand, and which will be laid before a committee of the House of Commons, so soon as it has been appointed to examine into the whole system of Chancery estate management. Our readers must concur with us, that even so far as the creditor is concerned, our premise and our conclusion were correct, when we stated that the Court of Chancery does not do for the creditor one-half that it might. It may, after much delay, give him back his talent, but it has not made anything of it during the time it has been retained in pledge.

It has never been stated with sufficient prominence, that no person, or class of persons, is benefitted by the present system of judicial estate management, except, it may be, the few solicitors who are concerned for receivers. Not the creditor, at least not to the extent he might be—for it is not enough for him that the court should be a judicial pound to keep property safe, it should also improve or enhance its value during the period of its custody. An estate is taken from a proprietor by a creditor, and transferred for safe keeping to a locum tenens, which should be omnipotent, and yet is impotent. Admitting that there may be required for the creditor an auxiliary for the recovery of his debt, safe and sure; but in guarding his interests, those of others must not be sacrificed, and, above all, not sacrificed without benefitting him. Law expenses entailed by the present mode of management, and a deteriorated estate, are the consequences of Chancery interference to the owner. Neither of these things are beneficial to the creditor; they are, on the contrary, detrimental, as they diminish the value of his security; and thus, without enriching him, the owner is made poor indeed. These are the consequences which the creditor never anticipated—never wished for—when he sought the assistance of the court, and are equally prejudicial to him as to every one else.

We have already pointed out the evil effects of the system on owner, occupier, and country, but we shall again return to the subject, and state further facts.

Few questions, in practice, have led to so many nice and subtle distinctions as those relative to the production of documents on interlocutory applications.

We have been led to the consideration of the subject, both by the number of the cases and the conflict of authority; some judges leaning to discovery, and others to privilege and protection. The number of cases occurring in England is almost amazing, occasioned, in some degree, by the non-existence of a general registry, discovery is more difficult, and accordingly more pressed for by the plaintiff, and more surely resisted by the defendant than in this country. It was the observation of a celebrated popular writer, that half the miseries of the world spring from foolish mysteries; and the remark holds with as much truth in the legal as in any other world. The unnecessary desire for concealment, the studied disingenuousness of legal documents, are productive of much litigation. For our own part, we are much more disposed to acquiesce in the soundness of the views of Lord Langdale, than in those of any of his brethren who dissent from him. He considers the object of a Court of Equity to be, to enforce discovery by the confession of the defendant, on his oath, and therefore believing the plaintiff entitled to the fullest information, he will not allow it to be withheld by an answer, which, half confessing, half denied, (to use his own language) he considers an answer "should lay naked the heart of the defendant."

A difference of opinion exists between the Irish Chancellor and Master of the Rolls on one branch of this subject. Whether a party having a sole right to the possession of title deeds, and limiting, by his answer, their possession, materiality, and relevancy, can yet refuse to produce them, on the ground of absent parties having an interest in them, the object of the suit affecting those absent parties.

The case to which we allude is that of Dundas Blake (9 L. E. R. 640; 10 ib. 260), where, however, the point was made at the argument, and raised by the defendants in the pleadings. The material facts are short. The bill was filed to carry into execution the trusts of a will, and to be the amount of a mortgage and judgment, which were barred by the Statute of Limitations, and only existed under the trust. (It has been held, that they were not saved from the operation of the statute, ante, p. 121). One of the defendants derived under the will, the property having been appointed to him under a power, and at his marriage it was settled on him for life, remainder to his children, as he should appoint; and, in default, to all the children of the marriage, as tenants in tail in common. The eldest son, who was a minor, was made a defendant, the plaintiffs alleging he was sole tenant in tail, and the bill charged that the deed of appointment and marriage settlement were made subject to the trusts of the will. The defendants, husband and wife, admitted the possession of both deeds, partly set them out in the answer, introducing particulars in which they varied from the statements in the bill, alleging the interest of the other minors under the settlement, and referred to them for greater certainty; and, in short, made no stand whatever upon the interrogatory, either on the ground of the minor defendants being absent parties, or for any other reason. His Honour ordered the production of the deed of appointment, considering it to be the sole title of the father, but refused to compel production of the marriage settlement, as minors not being parties to the suit, and having no interest in it.

The defendants appealed, and the plaintiff's cross appealed, and the Chancellor ordered the production of both deeds.

It is observable that many elements contributed to assist the plaintiffs, unqualified admissions, relevancy, materiality, ownership, possession, and the power to produce.

His Honour, however, thought that a door might be opened to fraud, if a fishing bill could be put on the file, and holes picked in the title of absent parties. But it was urged with considerable force, and relied on by the Chancellor in his judgment, that the very suggestion of there being absent parties, arose from the defendant's statement of the deed, that might be true, or it might be false; the deed itself could alone test the fact, it was referred to for the truth of that statement, by the defendant's, and so long as *Hardman and Ellames continued law, that reference incorporated it with the answer, and made its production compulsory. As to opening the door for fraud, it might be, and we believe was observed, that it would be a reproach to the efficiency of a Court of Equity, to allow a tenant for life to have the uncontrolled dominion over the title-deeds of his property, to bring them into the market, for the purpose of borrowing money, to make every imaginable use of them, if he pleased, to post them on the walls of the court; and yet be enabled to screen himself from discovery, on the allegation of an absent party having an interest in them, he would then be allowed to use them for self-interest and withhold them for his own, and not the purposes of justice. That whether the suit affected the inheritance or not was immaterial, the injury would be the same to the remainderman, if it only affected the life-estate, and production was enforced, the information once obtained, could be used ever after.

The argument might be put thus. If you limit the relief you seek, to the person before the court, the plaintiff is either entitled to discovery from that person, or he is not. If he be, as he unquestionably must be from the admission in the answer, if the defendant alone be considered; is a Court of Equity to throw her shield over that defendant to the prejudice of the plaintiff, to guard against what may be but an imaginary danger; and if she does not throw that shield the discovery once obtained, the mischief is done so far as remaindermen are concerned, and it is wholly immaterial what the object of the suit be, if the distinction be drawn; that in suits affecting the interest of the tenant for life, merely production will be enforced, where there is an admission in the answer, or the other elements exist, on which Courts of Equity act; but that such production will not be enforced when the suit affects both the interest of the tenant for life and remaindermen, the latter class not being before the court. How easy evasion is the rule. What can be more facile, than to draw the bill against the tenant for life in the first instance, obtain discovery from him, and then amend the bill, and virtually affect the inheritance? the rule would be as idle, as the one which renders a bill of discovery demurrable, if it pray relief. In practice, the latter rule, leads to no other result than this, that when discovery is obtained, the bill is changed into a bill for relief, it has lost indeed, its primary name, but it has answered its purpose.

If, however, the rule be, that even where relief be sought only against the tenant for life, the plaintiff is not entitled to discovery of the title deeds, because the interests of remaindermen may be re-

* In a very recent case, McIntosh v. The Great Western Railway (13 Jur. 179), Lord Cottenham restated the ground of his judgment in Hardman v. Ellames. "If a party refers to a document, and sets out a part of the document, and then refers to it, he cannot afterwards tell the plaintiff that he shall not see the document, because you are not bound to take the defendant's representation of the document. If he uses it for any purpose, he must enable the plaintiff to see that he uses it for a proper purpose, or whether it is not more beneficial to the plaintiff, than the defendant thinks proper to admit."

motely affected thereby, the result will be, that in no case can discovery, or its consequence, relief, be obtained from a tenant for life, as he can always shelter himself from production under the plea of absent parties, even though the information has no reference whatever to the inheritance—the ground of refusal being, that the disclosures in the deeds, though admittedly material to the plaintiff, may, on some other occasion, be used prejudicially to the rights of others. You may have justice on your side now, but in aiding you I may by possibility disclose to you a secret by which you may commit a fraud hereafter.

On which side, then, would the balance of inconvenience lie? Obviously, in our judgment, in refusing production.

In the affairs of mankind, a priori it must be assumed that plaintiffs come into a court of equity for legitimate ends, for its assistance in enforcing just demands—that was one of the designs of its institution—one of the purposes for which it was established. The refusal of discovery goes on the opposite supposition, as it assumes that plaintiffs come for improper purposes, and aid is denied them, because they may by possibility use it differently from what they profess to do; in other words, they may abuse it.

But so may mankind deal with every object of nature or of art, every institution human or divine; it is plain this argument is untenable. And besides, it is much more probable that the defendant, who desires concealment, has some sinister motive for secrecy, than the plaintiff who would do away with foolish mysteries.

The rule of enforcing production is a salutary one; to be extensively useful it should be clear, and explicit, and capable of easy and general application; the fewer distinctions that hover round it the better for justice. In the case before us, the refusal of the deed of settlement was a question of time; by amending the bill and bringing the minors before the court, we apprehend the objection of his honour would have been removed; and if production could have been enforced then, and if the deed must have been produced at the hearing, cui bono to the minors in postponing production? The case also was clearly distinguishable from those where trustees hold possession of deeds for others, or where there was a joint present possession, the joint owner not being before the court; though in these later cases, such as Taylor v. Rundell (1 Cr. & Ph. 104,) and Murray v. Walter, (ib. 111), the distinctions are rather too fine, and in every case where possession is coupled with the power of production, the safer rule would, we think, be to enforce it, always assuming there to be materiality and relevancy in the document, an admission in the answer, and that it is not protected from the circumstance of its being privileged as a professional confidential communication, relating to the subject matter of dispute.

In the case of Murphy v. Balfe, which came before his honour at the sittings after last Term, and is not yet reported, he expressed himself as still adhering to the view which he entertained in the case of Dundas v. Blake, which he believed to have been decided on the plainest principles of justice, and to be in accordance with several English decisions. He, however, felt himself coerced by the decision of the Chancellor, and decided in consonance with it.

The point will probably be not considered yet quite settled, and the question will be more fairly raised when the defendant takes his stand upon the interrogatory, and relies upon the absence of minors as a ground of defence. This was not done in Dundas v. Blake, and unquestionably, in some degree, the decision of the Chancellor turned upon that ground, but we believe, also, on the broader view which we have endeavoured to put forward.

8. Act to be deemed a Post-office act.

Whereas by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 96, it is enacted, that the mode of transmitting small sums of money through the Post-office, might have continuance so long as the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury should see fit; and whereas it is expedient to make further provisions as to money orders granted or issued by the Post-office: he it enacted, that no money orders heretofore by virtue of the said regulations, or of the said act, shall continue in force for a longer period than twelve months from the passing of this act; and that after the expiration of that period all liability to pay such orders by the postmaster general, or of any officer of the Post-office, shall cease and determine: provided, that the postmaster general may pay any such money orders in special cases after such period shall have expired: provided, that the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, at any time or times hereafter, may alter the period hereby fixed for the payment of money orders, and may fix any other period for the payment of the same, such alteration not to commence or be in force until after the expiration of three calendar months after due notice of the proposed alteration shall have been given in the London Gazette.

2. That the postmaster general, may make any regulations relating to money orders, and to the payment thereof, and to the persons by or to whom the same shall be paid, and to the times at which and the mode in which the same shall be paid, as the said postmaster general, shall see fit, and from time to time, to alter or repeal any such regulations or restrictions, and make and establish any new or other regulations; and that all such regulations shall be binding, as well upon the persons to whom such money orders have been or shall be granted, and the payees thereof, and all persons claiming under them, and all other persons, as upon all officers of the Post-office; and all such regulations shall have the same force as if the same had been and were contained in his act; and that no action, or suit, at law or in equity shall be instituted, in any court or before any judge or justice, against the postmaster general or against any officer of the post office, or against any other person in consequence of the making of any such regulations, or of any compliance therewith, or otherwise in relation to any such regulations, or in consequence of the payment of any such money orders being refused or delayed by or on account of any accidental neglect, omission, or mistake by or on the part of any officer of the Post-office, or for any other cause, without fraud or wilful misbehaviour on the part of any such officer of the Post-office, any law, statute, or usage to the contrary in anywise notwithstanding.

3. That the postmaster general at any time hereafter may refund the amount of any money orders either heretofore granted or issued or to be hereafter granted or issued to the person or persons to whom the same have been or shall or may be so granted or issued, or his, her, or their executors or administrators, whether such money orders shall remain or be in the possession of such person or persons or not; and after any such repayment or refunding as aforesaid all liability by or on the part of the postmaster general, or of any officer of the Post-office or of the Post-office revenue, for or in respect of such money orders or of the granting or issuing of the same, or of the repayment or refunding the amount thereof, shall, as against the payees of such money orders and the holders thereof, and all other persons cease and determine.

4. That every officer of the Post-office who shall grant or issue any money order with a fraudulent intent shall in England and Ireland be guilty of felony, and in Scotland of a high crime and offence, and shall, either be transported beyond the seas for the term of seven years or be imprisoned for any term not exceeding three years.

5. And for the more effectual prosecution of offenders be it enacted, that in any indictment for any felony or misdemeanour committed or attempted to be committed in, upon, or with respect to the Post-office or the Post-office revenue, or in, upon, or with respect to any property, monies, money orders, goods, chattels, or effects under the management or control of the postmaster general, or where any act, matter, or thing shall have been done by any person with or for any malicious, or fraudulent design, relating to or concerning the Post-office or the Post-office revenue, or any such property, monies, money orders, goods, chattels, or effects as aforesaid, or the postmaster general, it shall be sufficient to lay any such property in, and to state or allege the same to belong to, and to state or allege any such act, matter, or thing to have been done or committed with intent to injure or defraud "Her Majesty's postmaster general;" and in all indictments relating to or in any wise concerning the department of the Post-office it shall be sufficient to name and describe the postmaster general as "Her Majesty's postmaster general," without any further or other name, or addition.

6. That whenever the warrant of the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury is required by this act, such warrant may be under the hands of the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, or any three of them; and that whenever the order, consent, authority, or direction of the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury is prescribed by this act, such order, consent, authority, or direction (not being by warrant) may be signified either under the hands of the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, or any three of them, or under the hand of one of their secretaries or assistant secretaries.

7. That any copy of the London Gazette, printed and published by the person or persons having authority to print and publish the same, shall be admitted as evidence by all courts, judges, justices, and others in any part of Her Majesty's dominions of any treasury warrant and of any regulations or restrictions which shall be issued under this act, and contained in any such gazette, and of the due issuing thereof, and of the contents of any such warrant regulations, or restrictions.

8. That this act shall be deemed and taken to be a Post-office act, and that the several terms and expressions used in this act shall be construed according to the respective interpretations contained in the said act passed in the 3 & 4

Vict. c. 96, so far as they are inconsistent with the context.

9. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed during the present session of parliament.

CAP. LXXXIX.

An act to continue for two years, and to the end of the then next session of parliament, and to amend an act of the second and third years of her present Majesty, intituled, An act to extend and render more effectual for five years an act passed in the fourth year of his late Majesty George the Fourth, to amend an act passed in the fiftieth year of his Majesty George the Third, for preventing the administering and taking unlawful oaths in Ireland.

[31st August, 1848.]

Sec. 1. Recited act of 2 & 3 Vict. to continue in force for a further period of two years.

2. Constables with warrant may enter and search houses, and seize papers and arms, &c.

3. Duration of act.

'Whereas acts were passed in the 50 Geo. 3, c. 103, 4 Geo. 4, c. 87, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 78, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 55, and it is expedient that the act of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, should be continued and amended as herein-after provided,' be it therefore enacted in this present parliament assembled that the last-mentioned act shall be and continue in full force and effect from the passing of this act for the further period of two years.

2. That if information upon oath shall be given to any justice of the peace in Ireland, that there is cause for believing that any society or societies within the meaning of the said acts or any of them is or are held, or is or are about to be held, or that any persons are met or assembled, or are about to meet or assemble, for treasonable or seditious purposes, or for the discussion of treasonable or seditious purposes, in any house, building, or any other place, such justice may issue his warrant to any county-inspector, sub-inspector, or head constable, empowering him to enter any such house, building, or other place, and to remain in such house, building, or other place, for so long a time as he may think fit, and to seize all books, papers, and writings which shall appear to afford evidence of the holding or of the existence of any such society or societies, or of any treasonable or seditious purposes and objects, and all arms and ammunition of every description, that may be found in such house, building, or other place, and to search all parts of such house, building, or other place, for the purpose of discovering the same; and such county-inspector, sub-inspector, or head constable, with such constables and other persons as he shall deem necessary for that purpose, may enter such house, building, or other place, and, if need be, to use force, whether by breaking open doors or otherwise, and to remain with such constables and other persons in such house building, or other place for so long a time as he shall think fit, and to seize all such books, papers, and writings, and all arms and ammunition of every description whatsoever, that may be found in such house, room, building, or other place, and to search all parts of such house, building, or other place for the purpose of discovering the same.

3. That this act shall continue in force from the passing thereof for two years, and until the end of the then next session of parliament.

42. Minimum of penalties in certain cases.
43. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas an act was passed in the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 106, and whereas the same was amended by an act of the seventh and eighth years of the reign of Her said Majesty, and further amended by an act of the eighth and ninth years and by an act of the ninth and tenth years of Her said Majesty: and whereas by reason of the want of co-operation among the parties exercising the rights of salmon and trout fishing, and the extent of the common or public rights of such fishing on the sea-coast and in the estuaries and rivers of Ireland, and the varied and conflicting interests involved therein, measures have not been taken for the due protection of these fisheries, and the enforcement of the law in respect of the same; and it is expedient, with a view to the increase and improvement of the said fisheries, to make provision for more effectually carrying out the provisions of the said acts: and whereas it is expedient that funds should be provided for defraying the cost of such additional protection, and it is just and right that the same should be levied from the persons for the time being using any engine or device whatsoever for the capture of such fish: be it enacted, that the commissioners of public works in Ireland, as commissioners of fisheries, together with the inspecting commissioners of fisheries herein-after mentioned, shall be commissioners for the execution of this act, and shall have and use all the powers, privileges, and authorities vested in the commissioners for the execution of the said acts; and the said acts and this act shall be construed as one act.

2. That after the passing of this act the two inspectors of fisheries appointed under the provisions of the said acts shall be denominated and shall, during the pleasure of the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, be inspecting commissioners of fisheries, and shall be associated with the commissioners of public works in Ireland, and with them be commissioners for the execution of the said acts and this act; and in the case of any vacancy in the office of the said inspecting commissioners, or either of them, by death, resignation, or dismissal, the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury from time to time to appoint in the room of each such inspecting commissioners so dying, resigning, or being dismissed, another inspecting commissioner of fisheries, who shall be associated with the said commissioners of public works in like manner; and the said commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury shall be empowered to fix such salaries for any such inspecting commissioners as they shall think fit; and such inspecting commissioners of fisheries shall and may, for the purposes of the said recited acts and this act, have, use, and exercise all and every the like powers and authorities and have like privileges as are by the said recited acts or any of them vested in or given to the said commissioners of public works, and all and every the powers and authorities in and by the said recited acts and this act given to or vested in the said commissioners of public works, or which under this act may be used by or be vested in such inspecting commissioners of fisheries, may be exercised by the said commissioners of public works, or by such inspecting commissioners of fisheries, or by any one or more of them.

3. That the said commissioners shall, before the end of this present year, or at any time afterwards, as they may find it expedient, divide Ireland and the sea-coast and islands thereof into districts, and shall cause the said districts to be defined and described by suitable notices and maps for that purpose; and each such district shall embrace one or more river or rivers, or lake or lakes, with the tributaries thereof, which are frequented by salmon, trout, or pike, or fish of the salmon kind, or eels, together with such portions of the sea-coast and islands adjacent thereto as shall be described by such maps; and the said commis-oners shall subdivide each such district into two or more electoral divisions, to be called the upper or fresh water and lower or tidal electoral divisions of such districts, and upon the maps aforesaid the said commissioners shall cause to be delineated the limits and boundaries of such electoral divisions; and the said commissioners from time to time, may alter any such district or electoral division and fix their boundaries for the same, duly publishing and describing the same as herein-before provided.

4. That for each district conservators of fisheries shall be annually elected and appointed as herein-after provided.

5. That the said commissioners shall be authorized and empowered to determine and declare the number of conservators not less than three nor more than nine, which shall be elected and returned from each such electoral division to represent the same, and the persons so to be returned for each electoral division shall be the elected conservators of fisheries for the district until the next annual election.

6. That if in any district one or more persons shall possess a several or exclusive fishery or fisheries therein, as owner, lessee, or occupier, valued under the acts for the relief of the poor in Ireland at £100 yearly or upwards, or they shall be entitled to sit with the elected conservators for such district, and shall be deemed ex officio a conservator or conservators for the same, so long as he or they shall possess such fishery or fisheries, and shall vote, and have all the powers and privileges under this act which he said elected conservators may individually possess: provided that where a fishery so rated shall be held by several persons as owners, lessees, or occupiers, one person alone shall sit and act as a conservator in respect of such fishery.

7. That the elected conservators shall be elected annually by the persons who shall have paid licence duty and been licensed within each electoral division, under this act, in the manner herein-after mentioned.

8. That after the 1st of January, 1849, all engines, nets, instruments, devices used for the taking of salmon, trout, pike, or fish of the salmon and trout kind, or for the taking of eels, and all fixed salmon, trout, or eel fisheries within any district, or on or off the sea-coast, shall before the same be used in the said year or any subsequent year, be duly licensed and rated in the manner herein-after prescribed, upon payment of the licence duty or rate, as the case may be, herein-after provided.

9. That every person who shall have paid licence under this act, within and for any such electoral division within any year, shall be entitled to vote at the election of the conservators to be chosen for such division held for such current year, either in person or by proxy, according to such regulations and forms for the election as shall be fixed by the commissioners, such proxy being a qualified elector, and shall have a vote or votes according to the following scale: (that is to say,) if the licence duty so paid by such person shall not amount to two pounds, one vote; if the same shall amount to two pounds, and not to five pounds, two votes; and if the same shall amount to five pounds, and not to ten pounds, three votes; and if the same shall exceed ten pounds, four votes.

10. That for the purposes of the first meetings in each and every electoral division under this act for the election of conservators, the said commissioners shall fix and determine the scale of licence duties and rates to be paid in respect of all engines, nets, instruments, or devices whatsoever used for the taking of salmon, trout, pike, or fish of the salmon or trout kind, and for the taking of eels, and for all fixed salmon, trout, or eel fisheries within each district, or on or off the sea-coast thereof, and shall give public notice of the same within each electoral division, and such scale of licence duties and rates shall remain in force until the same shall be altered under this act: provided that such licence duties and rates respectively shall not exceed the amount of the respective licence duties and rates specified in the schedule to this act.

11. That the said commissioners shall appoint the places and times at which all persons who shall have paid the licence duty as herein provided in each electoral division of each district for the year 1849, shall assemble in the month of July in that year, the commissioners giving two week's notice thereof by hand-bills and advertisements in two or more newspapers circulating in such district; and all persons who shall have paid any such licence duty for such year within such electoral division shall vote at such respective meeting, and shall choose a chairman to preside thereat: provided that the said commissioners, or any one or more of them, may attend and preside at any such first meeting, instead of such chairman.

12. That the persons so assembled in each electoral division at such first meetings, and at all annual meetings for such elections, and who shall be qualified to vote under this act, shall have power to elect the appointed number of persons to represent them as conservators of the fisheries for the ensuing year; and the chairman as aforesaid, or the said commissioners, may receive the votes of the persons so assembled, and may declare the persons who shall have received the greater number of votes to be the elected conservators; and the chairman of such meeting, or the said commissioners, shall certify under his or their hand the election of each conservator, and furnish him with a certificate, which shall be sufficient authority for him to act as such conservator, and shall also within four days after such election cause a list of such conservators, with a statement of the residence and post town of each, to be transmitted to the office of the said commissioners; and the persons so elected for each electoral division of a district shall conjointly form, with any such ex officio conservators as aforesaid, a board of conservators of fisheries for such district, until the formation of a new board in like manner in the ensuing year, and so in like manner in each succeeding year.

13. That after the first board of conservators of fisheries for any district shall have been formed, the board of conservators for each such district shall be and are hereby empowered, from time to time, to fix and determine the amount of licence duty to be paid for each year after the year 1849, for every engine, net, instrument, weir, or device set forth in the schedule to this act, used for the taking of salmon, trout, pike, or fish of the salmon kind, and for the taking of eels, within each such district, or on or off the sea-coast thereof, and for every engine, net, instrument, weir, or device which may be proposed to be used, and which is not enumerated in the said schedule; and the board of conservators may fix and determine the rate per centum to be paid for each year after the year 1849, upon the poor-law valuation, in the cases of fixed and established salmon, trout, or eel fisheries, which are designated several fisheries, as herein-before mentioned, within each district, or on or off the sea-coast thereof; provided that no licence duty or rate to be fixed by the said conservators shall exceed the respective amount of duty specified in the said schedule, or the rate of ten per centum on the poor law valuation of established or several fisheries; and that any alteration in the same so to be made shall commence and have effect on and from the first day of January in the then succeeding year.

14. That the board of conservators in each district shall fix and determine and duly publish notice of the times and places for the general meetings of such board, and also the times and places for the then next annual meetings of electors in each electoral division for the election of conservators for the same.

15. That if the persons entitled to meet and elect such representatives or conservators in any one or more electoral division or divisions of a district shall fail or neglect for any year so to do, the representatives or conservators of any other one or more electoral division or divisions of such district for which conservators shall have been elected shall be empowered to act in all matters and things relating to such district under the provisions of this act.

16. That if no one electoral division in a district shall in any year elect conservators, the previously-existing board of conservators for such district may continue to act as conservators for such district for that year.

17. That for the purposes of this act, at all district meetings of the board of conservators, three of the persons entitled and empowered to act and vote thereat, shall form a quorum, and all matters and things shall be determined and decided by the majority of such persons so assembled; and if on any matters upon which a difference may arise the votes shall be equal, the chairman shall, in addition to his original vote, be entitled to give a casting vote.

18. That any such board of conservators assembled at a district meeting may fix time and place for holding a general annual meeting, and hold adjourned meetings; and any three conservators may call special meetings, provided that notice of the place and time of each such special meeting, subscribed by three or more conservators, or by the clerk of the board, on their requisition to him, shall be inserted at least twice in some two newspapers circulating in the county or counties in which such district shall be situate, at least ten days before such meeting shall be held, or that the clerk of such board shall give ten days notice in writing of such meetings to each conservator entitled to act within such district.

19. That the board of conservators for each such district at the annual general meeting or some other meeting specially appointed by them before the first day of October 1849, and in each subsequent year, when it may be necessary to appoint a clerk or clerks, with reasonable salary or salaries, as the said board may think necessary, and to appoint some bank to act as treasurer or treasurers of such board, and also to appoint as many inspectors and water-bailiffs as may be necessary, with reasonable salaries, but only to the extent which the funds at their disposal will admit of, for the protection of the fisheries in the district, and for generally enforcing the fishery laws within the same: provided that no elected or other conservator shall be eligible to hold any appointment under this act from which any salary or emolument shall be derived; and it shall be lawful for the board of conservators from time to time to remove any such clerks, inspectors, or water bailiffs, and to nominate others.

20. That the board of conservators of any district shall be and are hereby empowered to apply from time to time, any portion of the funds in the hands of the treasurers to the credit of such district which they may think fit, for the purpose of making passes in or over weirs, or removing or making passes in or over natural obstructions in any river in such district, subject to the sanction of the said commissioners, under the provisions of the 5 & 6 Vic. c. 106; and upon obtaining the sanction of the said commissioners the said board of conservators may place to the credit of the said commissioners such sum of money as shall have been for that purpose approved by them, and the said commissioners thereupon may construct such works and make such alterations in the bed of any river as shall effectually secure a free and uninterrupted passage for fish, or to direct and cause such alterations to be made in any weir, dam, or dyke erected in or across any river frequented by salmon, for affording a free and uninterrupted passage for fish, pursuant to the powers and provisions of the said last-recited act.

DUBLIN, APRIL 7, 1849.

For nearly four years we have been afflicted with famine—throughout three of them, fever, of an aggravated character, has raged. A worse thing has now come upon us—cholera has again found its way to our shores—our western and southern population have starved in their own homes, emigrated to other countries, died in poor-houses, or live, in daily destitution, unprofitable paupers!

Our western and southern proprietary are ruined—thousands of acres, cultivable, and hitherto cultivated, lie waste, adding yet more of unproductive surface to the large extent of reclaimable, yet unreclaimed, lands of Ireland. When this good land is consigned to barrenness, we wonder not at the announcement, that the Waste Land Improvement Society has dissolved. Agriculture retrogrades—there is grief in retrospect—gloom in prospective—an unequal poor law paralyses exertion, checks the expenditure of capital, and threatens to engulf the country in one mass of ruin.

To remedy some of the evils we have enumerated—the removal of others rests with Providence—Lord John Russell trusts to a voluntary emigration and the chance of a good harvest. He explains the origin of the laissez faire principle; seems to think it applicable to the existing state of things, and to have satisfied himself that “there are some evils totally beyond the reach of any government.”

Sir Robert Peel, more equal to the present emergency, has shadowed forth—as yet, but dimly—a plan to extirpate poverty, and make the wildernesses of Munster and Connaught to “blossom as the rose,” and which, if successful, will conduce more to his fame, as a statesman, than any measure of his long public life. Ireland has hitherto been his “difficulty;” let him make it the foundation of that posthumous fame for which he yearns, and of a solid reputation achieved by an honourable and useful triumph over difficulties, and by which the happiness of four millions of human beings may be promoted, and half this island made prosperous and contented.

Nor is the time unfavourable for the introduction of a great change in the social condition of this country. “The darkest wave has bright foam near it.” The very depression under which we have laboured has abated, if not expelled, the fever of party heat and political animosity. The different classes of society have been more drawn together, and the opportunity seems golden for a happier amalgamation, and for the permanent improvement of the people of Ireland.

Sir Robert Peel seems disposed to grasp the favourable juncture, and he has within him one of the elements of success. Hopeful himself, he infuses hope in others; he looks the evil undismayed in the face, and “takes courage from its magnitude.”

Omnia possibilia sunt iis volentibus. And in truth, no one who looks at the great natural advantages of Ireland—her fine rivers, capacious harbours, and fertile soil, teeming with a hardy and industrious population—but must see, that except man deliberately thwarts the bountiful dispensations of Providence, her resources are amply sufficient to secure to her inexhaustible supplies of wealth and plenty, and that though calamities may temporarily suspend her prosperity, they cannot eventually extinguish it.

Amongst other measures which possess no novelty, he looks to one which will facilitate the transfer of property, and contribute to its better management when transferred. With this view, he proposes a Government Commission nearly absolute, with power to purchase, and to re-distribute to an improved proprietary the lands so purchased. The plan, as stated on Friday se’night, though sufficiently vast, yet, in some degree, dwindles from the size to which, when first stated, it appeared to extend itself.

As we understand it, he proposes, in substitution for the machinery of the Court of Chancery, that Government Commissioners may be empowered to sell the fee, discharged of all incumbrances, where poor rate, inclusive of the present arrears, is unpaid.

Now, whether much land will thus be confiscated, will depend on its future liability to poor rate. If the premier's plan of a maximum rate be made law, a great transfer of property will, in all probability, not change hands for default in poor rate; if, on the other hand, electoral divisions be taxed to support the amount of destitution existing upon them, the fee of Munster and Connaught will be sold for poor rate alone. But this would be too glaringly unjust to proprietor and incumbrancer, as it would cast all the burden of a visitation of Providence on them, and would sell them out under an ex post facto law, which neither contemplated at the period of their respective loans and purchases. A change in that law would also be essential, to induce purchasers to come forward, who would stand aloof whilst the amount of poor rate was indefinite, except, indeed, the Commissioners were prepared to occupy until they had cleared the land of their living incumbrances, and assumed a management, for which no staff would be strong enough, and no revenue sufficiently ample.

The Commissioners should be empowered to purchase up districts, without making the non-payment of poor rate the only test of purchase.

Incumbered estates, and estates in Chancery, should be sold. As we have already shewn, all the properties under our Courts of Equity—except those of minors and lunatics—are placed there for purposes of sale, and a great portion of them are ripe for transfer.

Sir Robert Peel's last speech manifests how entirely his views bear out those which we have, from time to time, enunciated, as to the evils of the present system of Equity estate management.

Incumbrancers are ill paid, owners are ruined, occupiers discouraged, and the country suffers. Receivers and lawyers are said to be the only parties benefitted, but the former find the office irksome, and the latter would be much better satisfied to have that class of professional business which springs from prosperity, than that which is the result of acute national distress. In the first case, they are better paid and better pleased. Their profession is an honourable and useful one, and not dependant for support on that branch of the system of the Court of Chancery which is vicious. They lose more by national adversity than they gain by the litigation, the product of it.

Sir Robert Peel observes—

"All your measures of drainage, of local improvement, of increase of fisheries, of emigration—all will be ineffectual, unless you can cure, in some way or other, those monstrous evils arising out of that condition of landed property to which I adverted the other night. If those estates, producing £800,000 a-year, with arrears annually accumulating, are not to allow more than £2,000 to be applied to the permanent improvement of the land—if there are certain principles and forms of Equity sanctioned by the Court of Chancery, which throw obstacles in the way of any improvement in that respect, you may feel assured that all your exertions will be ineffectual. I think it would be an inestimable benefit to every insolvent, and to every nominal owner, and to every incumbrancer who is receiving nothing, that it would, in short, be an advantage to everybody, except the receivers under the Court of Chancery, and the lawyers who are dividing the sums received from those estates amongst themselves—if by some process which should not be inconsistent with the principles of equity, and of fair dealing, you could relieve those estates from the control of the Court of Chancery, and permit them to be possessed by men of capital, who would embark in their cultivation with new hopes and fresh vigour, in my opinion, you would do more by that act for the advancement of Ireland than by any other act that can at present be adopted."

Here then, we have a statesman of Sir Robert Peel's sagacity, pronouncing the system adopted in the management of estates, under our Courts of Equity, the master evil of this country.

To extirpate the Court of Chancery altogether, would certainly be an alteration in our constitution; but not an improvement. To vest its powers, except temporarily in a commission, would be to transfer them to a more incompetent tribunal. The Irish Court of Chancery has been very well abused;—we have ourselves not spared it where we thought its practices deserving of reprobation;—but it cannot be dispensed with; there must be a controlling power somewhere, and no where can it, under ordinary circumstances, be better placed than at present. It has indeed, in many instances, failed in its mission, it has not kept pace with the railroad age in which we live, old practices and inveterate usages have clung to it with too much tenacity; it has not used the power of adaptability, which its happy constitution has invested it with sufficiently—but true wisdom will be best employed, not in superseding, but in remodelling it.

The proposed plan of a Commission is but temporary and local, it does not combat with the evils of a system of receiverships which will be perennial and universal. It is impossible to predicate that within any given time, this country will become so prosperous that no estates will be placed under Courts of Equity, and if not, there must be receivers over those estates, whether situate in Leinster, Ulster, Munster or Connaught. That such receivers, may do as much good and as little injury as possible, the present order of things must be changed. Sir Robert Peel's plan for the settlement of the distressed districts does not provide for this; in devising a scheme for one portion of the country, the interests of the other must not be overlooked.

Public attention is directed to the subject; its gaze should not be withdrawn, until the object on which it has looked with such pain, has been so remodelled, that the public eye can rest upon it with content, if not with complacency. A little thought will shew, how susceptible of improvement is the present system, (which nothing but habit could have reconciled us to endure,) and without injury to creditor, owner, or occupier, but benefit to all three.

Before we conclude, we wish to advert to a matter of detail, which we do not remember to have before stated. A tenant cannot take a lease under the Court of Chancery, except at an exorbitant rate. We do not exaggerate, when we state, that in every advertised letting—and lettings always are advertised, when the farm is of any extent—the expense to the tenant will be near £10. and the estate suffers as great expense, and he it observed, this lease is only for seven years pending the cause. Seven years pending the cause!!

How can estates under the controul of our Equity Courts be improved by the occupier, where the tenure is so insecure and so short?

And, on the other hand, the established practice accounts for the absence of all improvement by the court; acted on by two conflicting interests, its agency has become utterly neutralised. The owner, if he has a hope of retaining his estate, or does not lose his sense of benevolence with his sense of power, is desirous that the receiver should have money to expend in permanent or any useful improvement; the creditor effectively interposes. "Permanent improvements are worse than useless to me, if made with the money primarily liable to repay my debts." The receiver is listless, he is not paid to superintend improvements, and the court between two antagonistic forces, and a supine officer, does nothing.

The remedies suggested for the sad social state of Ireland, we make no doubt, will be many and various; we have glanced at one which high authority pronounces to be necessary, and sober thought to be practicable.

The recent case of Whittle v. Henning (18 L. J. 51, S. C., 12 Jur. 1079) has decided—overruling the decisions of the Vice-Chancellor of England in Hall v. Hugonin (14 Sim. 595, S. C., 10 Jur. 941), Crood v. Perry (14 Sim. 592), Wilson v. Oldham (ib. 594)—that there is no case in which a Court of Equity will assist a married woman in alienating, or reducing into possession for the purpose of alienation, her reversionary chattel interest during the lifetime of her husband.

It is not a little singular, that personality should be thus invested with the attribute of inalienability, whilst a married woman, during coverture, can disclaim or dispose of any interest or estate in land. The spirit of legislation has changed. Our forefathers thought personal property of little consideration, and not capable of being trammelled, from its want of fixity, with the same laws against alienation as real estate; but the modern doctrine of a Court of Equity guards, as to personality, the rights of married women, with more jealousy than the common law as to realty. In the one case, the policy of the law is to consider the security of the married woman as paramount to every consideration of subsequent family convenience, under the apprehension of her being too accessible to marital influence, which it is assumed, we suppose, will be always improperly exercised; at least, it thinks it better to guard against the possibility of such an occurrence, and admits of no examination, as to free will or free agency, however respectable or above suspicion this may be. There are cases, no doubt, in which she can waive her equity to a settlement by a separate examination and consent, but the late Master of the Rolls, in the case of Bos v. Jackson (6 L. E. R. 182), thought it would be a perversion of that practice to extend it to any subject but that which is well known as the wife's equity, "her right to her chose in action, and her reversionary equitable right to personal chattels not reduced into possession during the coverture rest in her by law without her consent; and the same law which gives her the property, disables her from disposing of it. To receive and act on her consent here, would be to defeat her right, and the policy and reason of her disability. But her equity is the creature of this court, and is governed altogether by rules applicable to it, and to no other species of right; it is not founded on contract, it owes its existence to the arbitrary interference of this court.....I may say that it is anomalous, wanting many of the incidents of property, and that it would be subversive of the established policy of the law to make this peculiar and qualified right of waiving a benefit preferred to her by this court, an argument or precedent for enabling her to defeat those rights with which the common law has, while she is married, inalienably invested her."

The distinction which has arisen in the policy of the law, we apprehend, also, to have been occasioned by the fact of the supply of land being limited, and the difficulties of transfer sufficiently great. It was, therefore considered inexpedient, in a national point of view, to tie up real estate, and throw an impediment in the way of its changing hands, even though the interests of married women should in some degree suffer, and a safeguard be removed, the national convenience preponderating over individual interest. In personal property, the same public grounds were not supposed to exist; and it may have been considered just, even in these palmy days of free trade, to leave one relic of protection.

Whatever may have been the origin of the rule, it is now settled, whether the interest came to the wife by contract, or independently of contract, that she cannot by any contrivance, reduce her contingent reversionary chose in action into possession. Bos v. Jackson, (6 Lr. Eq. 174), decides that she cannot do so by consent in a Court of Equity, even though the contingency does not depend upon her surviving her husband; the decision was contrary to Sir E. Sugden's first impression, who thought that the consent of the wife could be taken "whenever the contingency on which her interest depends, is not that of her surviving her husband; and that with that exception, the property may be dealt with in the same manner as if the interest were immediate." In that case the reversionary interest was expectant upon the decease of the lady's mother. In Nixon v. Nixon, (8 L. E. R. 254), the fund was vested in trustees, as to the interest for the lady's separate use for life, after her husband's decease, in trust for her absolutely, and after her decease, as to one moiety for her children by a former marriage; in case of their deaths, for the sole use of the lady—and as to the other moiety, on which the question arose—in trust for her absolute use, as she should by any deed, or any will, during and notwithstanding coverture appoint, and in default of appointment, in trust for the children of the intended marriage; and if no issue, for the husband, and if no appointment of any of the property, then the entire of the property for the sole use of the lady. There was a covenant by the husband, that, after-acquired property in right of the wife, should be settled upon the same trusts. The lady afterwards acquired considerable sums by bequest, and as one of the next of kin of a relative, and applied to the trustees for a moiety of it, they declined to pay it over, upon which a bill was filed, which Sir Edward Sugden dismissed. It will be observed, the income was settled to the separate use of the wife, during coverture; to her absolute use in the event of her surviving him, and the principal as she should appoint. His Lordship observed, “that there was no question of merger, during their joint lives, the estate is secured to her separate use; after the determination of that estate, the property is not settled to her separate use. She takes it absolutely, and taking it absolutely, according to the settled law of the court, she cannot alien it during the lifetime of her husband.”

In England, the ingenious contrivance was resorted to of accelerating the possession, by conveying the intervening interests to the feme covert, the reversioner, so that they might merge, or be extinguished in the reversion, and the reversion thereby reduced into possession, by creating a species of union of the particular estate, with the interest in remainder. And this was acted upon by the Vice-Chancellor, Sir L. Shadwell, in the cases before referred to. In his judgment in Hall v. Hugonin, he says—“Suppose a father gives a sum of stock to a trustee for his daughter Elizabeth for life, remainder to his daughter Mary, a married woman, absolutely, and that immediately after his death, Elizabeth assigns her life interest to Mary, are not, by that mere act, both the life interest of her sister, and also her own absolute interest in remainder, vested in her? I do not put the case as one of merger, but I ask, whether the married daughter has not both the interests—that is, the life interest of her sister, and also her own absolute interest in remainder? If she has then the whole interest, is it not an interest with which she is capable of dealing, in this court, as if it had been originally given to her absolutely?” The argument of Mr. Rendall, in the same case, is the true answer to the general proposition stated by the Vice-Chancellor, the hypothetical case put by him by no means warranting such a deduction. The argument of Mr. Rendall is—“That a Court of Equity considers married women as objects of its especial protection, and, consequently—to adopt the language of Sir J. Leach, (Pickard v. Roberts, 3 Madd. 384)—it will never lend itself as an instrument to enable the husband to acquire a right in his wife's personal property, which he can by no means acquire at law.” In the case put by the Vice-Chancellor, Shadwell, Elizabeth had an undoubted right to assign her interest to her sister, the married woman; that interest having thereby become present and vested, not reversionary, it would undoubtedly be capable of being assigned, it was no longer a life interest within the principle laid down in Purdew v. Jackson (1 Russ. 71), and Stiffe v. Everett (1 My. & Cr. 37), both of which cases were decided on the principle, that neither the husband alone, nor the husband and wife together, could dispose of the wife's life interest, in consequence of the possibility of her survivorship. In Stiffe v. Everett, Lord Cottenham says—“I do not see how, consistently with the cases of Purdew v. Jackson and Honner v. Morton, the husband can make title to such of the dividends of the fund as may accrue after his own death, and during the life of his wife surviving him.” In the case put by the Vice-Chancellor, the interest being absolute, would be capable of alienation by the husband, when reduced into possession; and, as the wife would, in this case, be entitled only to her equity to a settlement, her consent to part with that would be taken by a Court of Equity, even though the fund should be her separate property, Major v. Lansley, (2 Russ. & My. 359); and it is on this ground of absolute interest the Vice-Chancellor rests his judgment, as he expressly guards himself from being thought to have put it on the ground of merger. The following contrivance was resorted to in Whittle v. Henning. There a sum of money to which the wife was entitled, under her father's will, was settled on her husband for life, remainder to herself for life; remainder to such children as they should jointly appoint; they appointed to an only son, and father and son assigned to the wife. As the wife took only an estate for life, according to the decision in Stiffe v. Everett, and Purdew v. Jackson, it was utterly impossible for the husband to alienate her possibility of survivorship, which would have been done, if the court had yielded to the means adopted to effectuate this object; for this reason, the husband will not be assisted by a Court of Equity to obtain personal property of the wife, not attainable at law. In Whittle v. Henning, although the whole interest in the money became vested in the wife, by the assignments, the husband could not have reduced it into possession, as the acts of the parties would not warrant the trustees in acting contrary to the settlement under which they were appointed. And this is the foundation of the judgment of the court, that it would not lend its aid to do that indirectly, which could not otherwise be directly done. Lord Cottenham, in his judgment says, “the first thing the court had to consider was, how the rights of the parties could be affected by the machinery which they had adopted. Under the settlement the wife was to have the dividends for her life, subject to the prior life-interest of her husband; and therefore, she had an interest in reversion, which this court would not allow her to part with during her coverture. How, then, could this interest of the wife be affected by the deeds which had been executed? Whatever protection the wife would be entitled to against the interest which her husband might take jure mariti, she would not be deprived of by such a contrivance, as had been resorted to in the present case; otherwise it would not be practicable in many cases, for a father to make provision for his daughter, so as to protect her against her husband. This court had, however, adopted many rules for the protection of the wife; and so far interfered with the rights of the husband, as to refuse him any assistance in obtaining property which belonged to his wife, unless he made what the court considers a proper provision for her." This passage appears wholly to place the ground of the decision on the jurisdiction the court assumes for the protection of the wife, and its determination to prevent the rules it has established for the effectuation of this object, from being evaded by a contrivance, which in this case was evident, and to this length only can the case be pushed. To hold that when the estate has become absolute by the junction of the intermediate and reversionary estates through bona fide means; would lead to as great, if not greater inconvenience, than a relaxation of the wholesome rule laid down by Lord Cottenham, in Whittle v. Henning. The rule to be deduced from these considerations appeared to be, that when the chose in action, becomes so absolutely vested in the wife, as to be capable of being reduced into possession, though the interest of the wife had been reversionary, and as such unalienable up to the moment of the incident rendering it absolute—as in the case put in the Vice Chancellor, and in many others that may be easily conceived—there the Court of Equity will receive the wife's consent to waive her equity to a settlement. But when there are parties to take after the life-interest of the feme, as in Whittle v. Henning, and the other like cases, as the trustees cannot act upon the agreement between the cestui que trusts, and as the husband cannot consequently reduce the interest into possession—though in one sense absolutely vested by the conveyance of the parties to the wife. Then, under no circumstances, will the court interfere.

21. That for any engine, instrument, net, weir or device whatsoever not enumerated in the schedule to this act, and which may be proposed to be used for fishing for salmon, trout, pollen or fish of the salmon or trout kind, or for eels, the said commissioners at any time before a board of conservators shall be formed, and after the formation of such board, such board of conservators for the district may fix and determine the licence duty on payment of which the same may be used in such district, regard being had to the relative capability of capture and productiveness of the same, as compared with those set forth in the said schedule, and the relative proportion of the duties therein set forth: provided that the party proposing to use any such engine, instrument, net, weir, or device not enumerated in such schedule shall previously give notice to some constabulary or coast guard officer of the district, or to some inspector appointed under this act, of his intention to use the same, who shall and is hereby required to forward to the said commissioners or the said conservators, as the case may be, a description thereof, as to its relative capability of capture as compared with the engines, instruments, nets, weirs, or devices set forth in the said schedule, and shall furnish the name by which it shall be designated, upon which the commissioners or the said conservators, as the case may be, may authorize the use of the same, upon payment of the licence duty which they may fix, and cause the same to be inserted in the schedule of licences for the said district: provided, that rods used singly for taking trout, perch, pike, or other fish, save and except salmon, shall not be subject to any licence duty under this act: provided, that if any person using a rod shall, under pretence or otherwise of fishing for trout, perch, pike, or other fish, take or kill salmon with such rod, such person shall be subject to a penalty of the like amount as the licence duty for the time being payable for a salmon rod, and the same shall be recoverable before a justice or justices in like manner as other penalties under the said recited acts or this act: provided, that all cross-lines used with a rod or rods for taking fish of any kind whatsoever shall be subject to the licence duty payable under this act for the time being upon cross lines and rods, until the same shall be altered as herein provided.

22. That if any person shall use or erect any engine, net, instrument, or device whatsoever, subjected to licence duty as aforesaid, for the taking of salmon, trout, pollen, or fish of the salmon or trout kind, or eels, or by any means fish within any fixed salmon, trout, or eel fishery in any year, without the same respectively being duly licensed for such year under this act, every such engine, net, instrument, and devices, and such means of fishing, shall be forfeited and sold, or otherwise disposed of, as the justice or justices shall deem fit, and the entire proceeds thereof shall be added to the general funds of the district constituted under this act in which the same shall be erected or used; and any person erecting or using the same shall be liable to pay such penalty, not less than half nor exceeding the whole of the licence duty at which under this act the engine, net, instrument, or device he shall have been so using or erecting would be subject to under this act, such forfeitures and penalties to be proceeded for and recovered under the warrant of such justice or justices, in the manner and subject to the regulations in the act of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 106.

23. That in all cases of fixed and established salmon, trout, or eel fisheries which under the said first-recited act are designated "several fisheries," or are now or may hereafter be claimed or possessed or used as several fisheries, whether the same be fished by means of weirs extending entirely or partly across rivers or estuaries, with boxes, baskets, or cruives, or be fished by means of existing natural or artificial obstructions stopping the fish, or by draft, pole, loop, or other nets, or by rod and line, or by any other means or device whatsoever, the persons using, occupying, or holding such fisheries, whether such occupation and holding shall be by lease, demise, agreement, or tenancy at will, or in fee simple, fee tail, or for life, shall in each year pay as an annual rate, in two equal half-yearly gales, on the 1st of February and the 1st of July in every year, such sum, in addition to the licence duty by this act provided to be paid for the engines, instruments, nets, or devices erected or used in fishing such fishery, as shall be equal to the difference between the sums paid by such persons for such licence duty or duties and the annual sum of ten per centum upon the poor law valuation of such fishery, subject to such alteration of such per-centage as may from time to time be made by the board of conservators of the district under the provisions of this act.

24. That such rate may be recovered in a summary way before any one or more justice or justices of the peace, as wages, or by civil bill before the assistant barrister of the respective county, or by action in the superior courts, at the suit of the said commissioners, if no board of conservators of the district shall have been formed, or if such board shall have been formed, then at the suit of the clerk of the said board of conservators.

25. That in any cases where any such fisheries as last aforesaid may not be or have not been valued by the persons appointed as valuers for the purposes of the poor laws, the said commissioners, on application of the board of conservators, may and are hereby empowered to call upon the poor law commissioners of Ireland to cause the same to be valued separately and distinctly from other property for the purposes of this act.

26. That such rate shall be collected by such persons as the said commissioners for the execution of this act, at any time before the formation of a board of conservators for the district, or after the formation of such board, then as the said board, as the case may be, shall appoint, adequate security being taken by the said commissioners or the said conservators, from the persons authorized to receive the same, for the duly accounting for the same, and for the due performance of the duties which the said commissioners or the said conservators, as the case may be, may prescribe and the cost of any allowance to be made for the collection of the same shall be charged to the expenses of the district for which the same shall be collected.

27. That the total amount of all sums of money received for all licence duties and rates, and from the sale of forfeited engines, nets, or instruments as aforesaid, and from penalties (save so much as shall be paid to any informer as herein-after mentioned) under the provisions of this act, shall, until the appointment of a treasurer for each respective district, be lodged in the bank of Ireland, to the credit of the said commissioners, in the matter of the district for which the same shall have been received, and shall be applied to the purposes of such respective district; and regular accounts of the receipts and disbursements on account of each district shall be kept and furnished by the said commissioners, until the appointment of such treasurer as aforesaid; and upon the appointment of a treasurer of each district respectively, the commissioners shall cause the monies lodged in the bank of Ireland in the matter of such respective district to be transferred and lodged with all accounts relating to such district to and with the respective treasurer of such district, and thenceforth all sums of money received for licence duties and rates, and forfeitures and penalties, for each such district, shall be paid over by the parties receiving the same to and received by such treasurer of such district, and be applied to the purpose of such district under the provisions of this act; and such treasurer shall pay such sums of money as shall be required for the purposes of the district from time to time upon a draft or order signed by the chairman at any general meeting of the board of conservators and by two other conservators.

28. That all licences under this act shall be prepared and printed in such form as the said commissioners shall prescribe or from time to time think necessary to adopt; and a separate licence shall be issued for each engine, net, instrument, or device for taking fish, and each licence issued before the formation of a board of conservators shall be stamped with the seal of the said commissioners, and if issued after the formation of such board with the seal of such board: provided that the year for which such licence shall issue, and a name, number, or letter describing the district and the electoral division in which the licence shall be used, and the name of the engine, net, instrument, or device for which the same shall be issued, shall be printed thereon; and such licence shall be only good and valid for the year, district, and purpose for which the same shall be issued; and that any party using or presenting the same for any other year, district, or purpose, or in any manner altering or counterfeiting the same, shall be liable to a penalty, not less than the whole amount of the licence duty for which the same shall have been issued, or which the party so misusing or counterfeiting the same would be liable to, and not exceeding double the amount of the same, at the discretion of such justice or justices before whom the offence may be tried.

29. That any person using any such engine, net, instrument, or device, or having the same erected or in fishing order, or found with the same in his possession, in or near any fishing place, or going to or returning from fishing, shall and is hereby required to produce to any of the said commissioners, or any officer of the said commissioners, or any conservator of the district, or any inspector, water bailiff, or officers, or men of the navy, coast guard, or constabulary, when demanded, the licence for the same, under like penalties as in the last preceding provision mentioned: provided that such parties as shall to the satisfaction of the justices or justice be proved to have them in possession as manufacturers or sellers of the same, and not for the purposes of using the same within the year in which such demand shall be made of them, shall be exempt from any such penalty.

30. That such licences as aforesaid shall be sold either by licensed stamp distributors, and in such and so many places throughout each district, as the said commissioners before the formation of a board of conservators for the district, or after the formation of such board, then as such board of conservators, shall from time to time appoint, adequate security being taken by the said commissioners or the said board of conservators, as the case may be, from the persons authorized to sell the same, for duly accounting for the same and for the due performance of their duty; and the cost for any allowance to be made for the sale of the same shall be charged to the expenses of the district for which the same shall be issued: provided that if any person shall have paid a licence duty for a rod within any district as aforesaid, such person shall not be liable to pay an additional sum for a licence in any other district by reason only of angling with a rod in any other district.

31. That all persons demanding to purchase any such licences, and tendering to any person so appointed to distribute the same the amount of licence duty for the time being to be paid under this act, shall be entitled to receive the same without any question or objection whatever arising either from the time when, the purpose for which or the right in virtue of which, he or they may desire to use such licence: provided that nothing herein contained with reference to the possession of any such licence, or the payment of the licence duty or rates under this act, shall be construed to give or confer any right of fishing or of using any instrument or device for taking fish by any means or in any place which the party having or using such licence would not have possessed if this act had not been passed, or to alter or affect the rights of any other persons.

32. That all persons whom the commissioners or board of conservators, shall appoint to sell licences, shall furnish to the said commissioners or board of conservators, an account of such sales monthly, or so often as they may require, and shall set forth in such accounts the sums received for licences for each particular engine, net, instrument, or device, the names and residences of the persons who shall have purchased such licences, and the district and electoral division of such district for which such licences shall have been obtained.

33. That the board of conservators of each district shall take security from any clerk whom they may appoint, and any other officer or person having the care or custody of money to be received by virtue of this act, for the due execution of the duties of his respective office, or for duly accounting for such money, as the said board of conservators shall think proper; and such clerks shall attend the stated and other meetings of the said board, and shall, in a proper book or books, enter and keep a true account of all the monies to be received, and of the application of the same, and of all the acts, proceedings, and transactions of the said board, by virtue of and under the authority of this act, and shall perform such other duties as the said board may direct; and every conservator shall and may at all convenient times have access to and peruse and inspect the same, and each such board are hereby empowered and required to cause their said clerk to furnish to the said commissioners annually, or as often as they may require, an account of all monies received and disbursed relating to each such district under the authority of the board of conservators.

34. That such inspectors and water bailiffs appointed under this act shall have, for the enforcement of the said recited acts and this act, the powers of constables, and all the powers and authorities conferred on water bailiffs, or officers or men of the constabulary force or coast guard, or navy, under the said recited acts or any of them.

35. That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures under this act not herein-before provided for shall be recoverable in like manner as penalties and forfeitures under the provisions of the said first-recited act, and one moiety of every sum of money levied as a fine or penalty for any offence under the provisions of the said recited acts or this act (save and except penalties for non-payment of any such licence duty as aforesaid) shall be paid to the informer or person who shall be the means of bringing to justice any person offending against any of such provisions, and the other moiety shall (anything in the said recited acts to the contrary notwithstanding) be applied to the purposes of this act for the district formed under this act in which such offence shall have been committed.

36. That the appointment of officers under this act shall not be subject or liable to the payment of any stamp duty.

37. That nothing in this act contained shall lessen or abridge the powers conferred by the said recited acts on the said commissioners, or on any inspectors, water bailiffs, officers, and men of the navy, coast guard, or constabulary, but the same shall remain in full force and effect, and for aiding the officers, inspectors, and water bailiffs to be appointed under this act for enforcing the provisions of the said acts and this act.

38. That the said commissioners shall be empowered to attend any meeting of any board of conservators held under this act, and to advise, consult, and confer with them upon the regulation, management, and improvement of the fisheries, and shall at all convenient times have access to and peruse, the books and accounts kept for the purposes of any district under this act.

39. 'And whereas by the 5 & 6 Vict., the said commissioners are empowered, to decide that the period in the said act appointed for the close time of the fisheries therein mentioned should cease, and that such other period as should then be fixed upon by them as the close time for any of such fisheries should be kept and observed in lieu thereof, or to alter, as therein mentioned, the period within which it should not be lawful to hang any coghil or other nets in the gape, eyes, or sluices of eel or other weirs, or make use of fixed engines for taking eels, subject to the provisions in the said act contained: and whereas by the said act of the 9 & 10 Vict., so much of the said first-recited act as specified the close time or close season in which no fish of the salmon kind should be taken is repealed, and new periods for the close time as to fish of the salmon kind are by the said act prescribed and substituted: and whereas doubts may be entertained whether the powers of the said commissioners to alter the close time or close season as to such fish of the salmon kind as aforesaid, under the provisions of the said first-recited act are still subsisting and unaffected by the provisions of the 9 & 10 Vict.; and for the removal of such doubts, be it enacted, that all the powers and authorities vested in the said commissioners under the said first-recited act relating to the altering the close time or close season for any such fisheries in the said act mentioned, and also for altering any close time or close season for any estuary or portion of the sea-coast, or for any tideways, or for any river or lake above the tideway or portion thereof where the tide ebbs and flows, prescribed and established by the said act of the 9 & 10 Vict., shall be and remain in full force and effect, and may be used and exercised as to any of such close seasons in like manner and subject to like provisions as in the said first-recited act of the 7 & 8 Vict.: provided always, that in case the said commissioners shall decide upon altering any of such close seasons, such change or alteration shall commence and take effect at the expiration of six weeks from the date of the publication of the said decision in the Dublin Gazette, anything in the said first-recited act to the contrary notwithstanding.

40. 'And whereas by the 9 & 10 Vict., certain periods are fixed during which fish of the salmon kind shall not be killed, destroyed, or taken, and it is provided that (save as therein-after mentioned, and save in the counties of Antrim, Tyrone, Donegal, Londonderry, Mayo, Kerry, Leitrim, and Sligo,) no fish of the salmon kind

'shall be killed, destroyed, or taken by any person or by any means in or from any part of any river or lake above the tideway, or portion thereof where the tide ebbs and flows, between the 15th of September in each year and the last day of February in the year following, inclusive; provided that in any river or lake above the tideway, or portion thereof where the tide ebbs or flows, no fish of the salmon kind shall be killed, destroyed, or taken between the 1st and 14th of September, both the said days inclusive, by any person by any means whatsoever, save by rods and lines only: and whereas by means of the said provisions the open time for fishing with rods and lines in rivers and lakes above the tideways is shorter by fourteen days than the open time for fishing in any estuary or on the sea-coast, or in the tideway of any river or lake: and whereas it is expedient and equitable to equalise the periods of open time for fishing with rods and lines: be it enacted, that after the passing of this act, as regards all parts of Ireland and the sea-coast thereof (save the said eight counties and the sea-coast thereof herein-before mentioned,) the close time during which it shall not be lawful to kill, destroy, or take fish of the salmon kind, in or from any part of any river or lake above the tideway with rods and lines only, shall be between the 29th of September in each year and the last day of February in the year following, both days inclusive, unless and until such close time shall be altered by the said commissioners under the provisions of the said recited acts and this act.

41. That if any person or persons, not being authorized by the owner, lessee, or occupier of a several fishery as defined under the first-recited act, shall enter into or upon such several fishery for the purpose or under the pretence of killing fish therein or taking fish therefrom, or shall kill fish therein or take fish therefrom, he or they shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a sum not less than 10s. nor more than £5, to be recoverable in a summary way before a justice or justices, as provided by the 5 & 6 Vict.

42. 'And whereas by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 36, it is provided that the several persons who shall commit any of the offences in the said section mentioned shall forfeit and pay any sums not exceeding the several and respective sums in the said section mentioned: and whereas it is expedient that a minimum penalty should be specified: be it enacted, that every person who shall commit any of the offences in the section specified shall (in addition to any other forfeiture thereby specified) forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding the sum for such offence respectively specified in the said section of the said act, and not less in any case than the sum of 10s.: provided that nothing in this act contained shall legalize any fishery or weir not being legal at the passing of this act.

43. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

SCHEDULE to which the foregoing act refers.

DUBLIN, APRIL 14, 1849.

A VERY excellent Bill has been introduced into the House of Commons for the amendment of the Law of Bankruptcy in Ireland, by Messrs. T. O'Brien, J. Reynolds, Grogan, and Napier.

No measure creating a change in the Bankrupt code has been passed in this country since the 6 W. 4, c. 14, whilst on the other side of the channel there has been an unintermitting flow of legislation on the subject.

The Bill before us, adopts extensively the improvements introduced into the English system, and many of the clauses are taken verbatim, or with some slight alteration from the English acts, especially the 5 and 6 Vict., c. 123, or from Lord Brougham's new Bill. We shall state a few of the most prominent sections, and of the more important changes contemplated.

Section 9 reduces the amount of debt, of a petitioning creditor, as follows: a single debt to £50, the debt of two petitioning creditors to £70, and that of three to £100.

A creditor is empowered to file an affidavit, in a prescribed form, of his debt, and of his having delivered to the trader an account of the particulars of his demand, and thereupon the Bankrupt Commissioners are empowered to summon the trader before them, and except he be prepared to admit the debt, and pay the creditor, or otherwise satisfy him within fourteen days after personal service of the summons, or make oath, that he has a good defence to the debt, and give security for payment of it and the costs of action, if he be unsuccessful, he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, on the fifteenth day after the service of the summons, provided a Commission issue, within two months, after filing of the creditor's affidavit.

To guard against the abuse of this process, Section 19, leaves it in the power of the Court, in which the action is brought, to give the Defendant the costs of the action, if the Plaintiff do not recover the sum mentioned in his affidavit, provided there were no reasonable or probable cause for making the affidavit.

If a trader do not pay or satisfy a judgment debt on which execution may be sued out, not having a set off thereto, within fourteen days after service of notice requiring payment, he shall be deemed on the fifteenth day to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and the same time is limited for disobedience of a decree of a Court of Equity, or an order in Bankruptcy or Lunacy, directing payment of a sum of money.

This Provision is stringent.

A declaration of insolvency, a secret transfer of goods—transfers deemed secret, when possession and removal of goods not made within a month after transfer, or two months before Commission—filing petition for arrangement between trader and creditor, where petition dismissed, are respectively declared acts of bankruptcy.

The present period for suing out a commission of bankruptcy by affidavit of debt and notice to pay, under 3 and 4 Vict., c. 105, s. 8, is forty-one days, the proposed Bill limits the time to twenty-one days, and thus makes the law, in this respect, identical with that of England, 1 & 2 Vict., c. 110, s. 8.

This mode of creating a bankruptcy is retained, that by a fourteen days summons being a mere public proceeding, and therefore, in some cases inexpedient. The amount of the petitioning creditor's debt, under the twenty-one days notice, is left the same as under the existing law.

We do not understand the motive of retaining the larger amount of debt for this mode of proceeding, and the lesser for the more summary process, except that the time for payment is slightly enlarged also.

If a Bankrupt do not dispute the commission within two months after advertisement of bankruptcy, the Gazette is conclusive evidence against such bankrupt. The 28th section corresponds with 5 & 6 Vict., c. 122, s. 24, except that the latter only allowed twenty-one days to the bankrupt to dispute the commission, which was too short an interval.

The 30th and 10th subsequent sections, relate to the appointment of one or two persons being merchants, brokers, or accountants, or being or having been engaged in trade and residents in Ireland, as official assignees of bankrupts. They are taken from 1 & 2 W. 4, c. 56; 11 & 12 Vict., c. 45, s. 26, (the act for winding up joint stock companies,) 5 & 6 Vict., c. 122, 7 & 8 Vict., c. 96.

The appointment is vested in the Lord Chancellor, and this change of the law is likely to prove most thoroughly beneficial.

The official assignees are at once to receive the bankrupt's estate and effects, be paid a percentage on the amount realized—such percentage to be in the discretion of the Commissioners,—and one official assignee is always to act in conjunction with the creditor's assignee, and prior to the appointment of the latter, sell and dispose of the bankrupt's estate.

The 40th section which corresponds with art. 173 of Lord Brougham's Bill, empowers the commissioners to set apart a portion of the bankrupt's pay, or half-pay, &c., and in this particular, to place a bankrupt in the position he would be in if he became an insolvent.

The 51st section suggests a useful improvement in the present law,—it enacts that the warrant of committal for refusing to answer, or not satisfactorily answering, need not specify the questions unanswered, except by reference to the examination or deposition, a copy of which is to be delivered to the prisoner within sixteen hours after committal. At present if a commissioner commit a contumacious bankrupt, every question must be set forth in the warrant of committal.

The present form is thus often very voluminous, sometimes extending over four or five pages closely written. And it is obvious that this system of labour, technicality, and expense was inconvenient.

The 57th section, copied from 5th & 6th Vict., c. 122, s. 38, disentitles a bankrupt to his certificate, if he has lost by gaming or wagering, in one day, £20; or within one year, preceding bankruptcy, £200; or £200 by stockjobbing; or has cancelled or destroyed his books, or made fraudulent entries, concealed his property, or permitted fictitious debts to be proved.

The allowance of the certificate is transferred from the creditors to the commissioners by section 57. This places the law of the two countries on the same footing. In future the certificate need not be signed by any creditor, but any creditor may oppose, and the commissioners must certify to the Chancellor, that the bankrupt has made a full discovery, and in all things conformed, the bankrupt must swear that the certificate was obtained fairly and without fraud, and the certificate must be confirmed by the Chancellor, against which confirmation, any creditor may be heard.

We think this alteration desirable, the more independent of his creditors, the bankrupt is, the better, and the less probability of underhand transactions. We should wish, however, a power of appeal given to the bankrupt from the commissioners to the Chancellor in the event of their refusing his certificate, we are averse to the constitution of any tribunal final in the first instance.

All contracts or securities to induce creditors to forbear opposition to the allowance of the certificate, are, by section 59, declared void, and the proposed bill goes further than the 40th section of the corresponding English act, 5 & 6 Vict., c. 122, by invalidating, not merely the security, but the bankrupt's certificate. By the 60th section, a penalty of treble the value of money given for forbearance, is imposed on the creditor.

The 63rd section preserves the same percentage of allowance to the bankrupt, after certificate, as at present, but postpones its payment to twelve months after the date of the commission, and makes it dependent on the payment of the requisite dividend to the creditors, and prohibits any allowance to a bankrupt who has not been a trader for twelve months, except in the case of the dividend being under ten shillings, when a discretionary power is given to the commissioners to make an allowance, irrespective of the period of trading, provided it does not exceed three per cent, or £300.

The 67th section provides for the preservation of the proceedings in the bankruptcy, which are to be deposited with the Registrars, who are made responsible for their safety, and they are to be open to inspection on payment of one shilling; under the present loose system, the attorney for the assignee keeps the proceedings, and on his death they are lost, mislaid, or, at all events, generally useless for ulterior purposes.

The 68th section provides that the appointment of the Secretary of bankrupts, and that of the Registrars, shall continue during good behaviour, and upon a vacancy of the office of clerk of enrolments, the office to cease, and the duties to be performed by the secretary. The appointment of the secretary is in the gift of the Chancellor, and the duration of the office has hitherto been measured by that of his own tenure of power, each new Chancellor appointing his own secretary for bankrupts.

It is desirable that competent men should not be removed when they have learned their duties, at the same time, we are not insensible to the value of a rapid succession.

The 69th section provides, that whenever the bankruptcy fund prove insufficient, the salary of the second commissioner and assistant registrar shall be paid out of the suitors fee fund, the latter to be reimbursed, whenever there shall be a surplus in the bankruptcy and compensation fund.

It will be in the recollection of our readers, that the deficiency arose, and in 1845, on argument before the then Master of the Rolls and Sir Edward Sugden, they were of opinion, that the second commissioner had no right to be paid out of the suitors fee fund—an order for that purpose having been made by Lord Plunket. In consequence of this decision, we believe, Sir Robert Peel, then premier, directed payment out of the consolidated fund, and we are very much disposed to think, that the future payments for both commissioners, should be made thereout likewise. With a view to make the court self-supporting or nearly so, the present scale of fees are too high; and although the suitors fee fund be ample, its surplus may be very well disposed of in diminishing the expense of Chancery documents which, on even the reduced scale, are inordinately extravagant.

The object of the 70th section is to remove any doubt arising on the 7th and 8th Vic., c. 90, s. 36, as to the right of detention of goods under attachment, and provides that they shall be delivered up to the assignees on demand. Goods, bona fide seized under an execution, at the date of the commission, cannot be claimed by the assignees, but in that case the process is after judgment; an attachment is but process to compel an appearance. We should rejoice to see a measure brought in by the introducers of the present measure, if not to abolish the process of city attachment altogether, at least greatly to modify it. We know no power capable of being converted into an instrument of greater oppression, than that of issuing a city attachment. The struggling traders of Dublin, are at the mercy of Jew money lenders; to whom they are compelled to resort from the insufficiency of banking accommodation: if the bill be unpaid the affidavit of debt is made, the marshal takes possession, and in the broad glare of day, if the oppressive security be not promptly given, the goods of the trader are swept away to the city stores, and his credit is thereby annihilated; arrest on mesne process was sufficiently injurious to credit, but we do believe it was not half so damaging as the seizure of a trader's goods—concealment in the one case was possible, in the other impracticable.

We do earnestly press this subject, more especially upon Mr. Napier, as a member of our own body, and as one whose rising position in the House, will ensure it the attention its importance deserves.

We pass over, for the present, some of the succeeding sections—next week we purpose to give a more minute analysis of the whole Bill—which relate principally to improvements in the working of the Bankrupt Court, and give increased power to the Commissioners to compel the attendance of witnesses. The 89th section, enables three-fifths of the creditors, after the schedule of the bankrupt shall have been furnished, to effect a composition, and provides for the superseding of the commission. At present a bankrupt cannot effect this composition, until after his final examination, nor unless nine tenths of his creditors consent; and it is considered that such composition does not bind a creditor who has not proved.

The present measure adopts the same machinery as that used in the Insolvent Court, for giving notice to the creditors, and enacts, section 92, that every creditor named in the schedule, and to whom notice shall have been given, shall be bound by the composition, whether he shall have proved or not.

Clauses from 93 to 110 inclusive, principally taken from Lord Brougham's bill, devise a mode by which, an honest creditor, without undergoing the humiliation of passing through the Bankrupt

Court, may, by act of quasi bankruptcy, vest his property in trustees, obtain protection for his person, and carry out this arrangement with the concurrence of two thirds in number and value of his creditors, unimpeded by the opposition of a hostile or implacable minority.

We cordially approve of these clauses, every one in practice finds how desirable and expedient these private arrangements are, how expeditious, how inexpensive, and how merciful; but they are almost universally thwarted by the malignant contumacy of a few small creditors, actuated either by revenge, malice, or the expectation that their opposition will be bought off.

We care not to conceal the deep indignation which we entertain towards low beings of this class, and we therefore rejoice at seeing a measure likely to be made law, which will give them a death blow.

It is rather anomalous that in this country there should be two concurrent and co-existing systems, applicable to one class of traders. We allude to the banker's acts, and the bankrupt code. The former, though limited to a small class in operation, are obviously the mode to be selected by that class. They possess the advantage to the banker of avoiding public exposure, and their adoption rests with himself. He has only in the first instance, to obtain the concurrence of trustees—the approval of the majority of the creditors may, we apprehend, be ex post facto,—but the machinery of the acts, from antiquity and other causes, requires remodelling. It is too expensive;—for example, the deeds of conveyance, are not exempt from stamp duty, and there are practical difficulties in taking proofs of debts; but their original spirit and design was excellent. Uniformity and codification are however, so desirable, that we think they should now be repealed. The sections to which we have last referred are conceived in the same humane spirit which gave the banker's bill existence, and obviate the necessity for their retention. Even without being formally repealed—which we suggest they should—it is probable, if the proposed measure become law, that they will die of disuse.

In the case of Carmichael v. Waterford and Limerick Railway Company (reported, 1 Ir. Jur. 186), which was an action on the case for executing a capias ad satis-faciendum, for the full amount of a judgment; a portion of the judgment debt having been paid, the question arose, whether, in the absence of proof of express malice, malice could be inferred from mere negligence. The facts were, the company had recovered a judgment against the plaintiff (in this action) in the sum of £585, with costs; all of which, except £274 0s. 4d., was satisfied by the plaintiff, notwithstanding which the defendants wilfully and maliciously caused the plaintiff to be arrested under an execution endorsed for the whole amount. The execution had been issued by the partner of the defendant's solicitor residing in Dublin, in ignorance of the payment made in the country; and the learned Judge who tried the case told the jury, that if the mistake arose from negligence, they were at liberty to infer malice. This direction the court held to be erroneous, saying, that "the action was maintainable only on the ground of proof of actual malice—malice being the gist of the action."

The case of De Medina v. Grove (10 Q. B. 152) and referred to in the argument in Carmichael v. Limerick and Waterford Railway Company, turned on a question of pleading, the declaration not having averred either malice or want of probable cause, merely stating that the defendant "wrongfully and injuriously" had caused the plaintiff to be taken in execution. Wilde, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the court of error, says, "The law allows every person to employ its process for the purpose of trying his rights, without subjecting him to any liability, unless he acts maliciously and without probable cause. The question arising upon this record is, whether the action is maintainable without the usual averments of malice and want of probable cause. Even if there be a sufficient statement of malice in this declaration, there is no sufficient statement of want of probable cause. It has been admitted, that the issuing of mesne process is a prima facie right, but a fortiori is the execution a prima facie right." "On the other hand, the plaintiff here might have applied—if the state of facts justified the application—either before the arrest, to have satisfaction entered up, or after the arrest, to be discharged. It might, therefore, be a question, whether, with all proper averments on the record, the proper remedy would be by action; for it might be contended, that what is complained of by the plaintiff is a mere irregularity." This dictum implies, and would go to shew that no action will lie; and we think that the true deduction derivable from the principles stated in the authorities on this branch of the law.

It is almost needless to draw the attention of the reader to the distinction between issuing, and acting on, an execution for more than the actual amount of the judgment, and the case we have been hitherto considering, of a party being arrested for the full amount of a judgment, a portion of which has been paid. In the former case, the very act of executing the process of the court for more than the judgment creditor has himself alleged to be due, is prima facie evidence of malice, and none need be alleged, the want of probable cause being apparent in the excess of the writ of execution over the judgment. In the latter, the unsatisfied judgment giving a prima facie right, or, in other words, a probable cause, malice—according to the decision in Carmichael v. Waterford and Limerick Railway Company—must be averred and proved, or, as we are inclined to think, in accordance with the view of Wilde, C. J., before referred to, there is no ground of action whatever.

In stating this proposition, we are not to be understood as saying, that if the plaintiff in the action had been wilfully and maliciously persecuted, that he is wholly without remedy, because his creditor has this prima facie right or probable cause. There is another form of action on the case, in which the creditor so acting would appear to be liable—that for abusing the process of the court, as was suggested in the case of Heywood v. Cullings (9 Ad. & El. 268), which, as in both the cases we have referred to, was an action on the case for a malicious arrest without probable cause. The declaration stated the arrest of the plaintiff, on a second writ for the same debt he had previously been held to bail for. Plea, that the last mentioned action was still depending. On a demurrer to this plea, Lord Denman, C.J., says, "It is contended for the plaintiff, that this is an action for a malicious abuse of the process of the court, by a second arrest for the same cause. I am unwilling to hold, that the action is maintainable; for the defendant, in arresting under a second writ, does not necessarily appear to have done anything which he might not lawfully do." And Coleridge, J., in the same case, in answer to the objection, that an action for the abuse of the process of the court would be a novelty, says, "If an action is not sustainable under such circumstances, we must be prepared to hold, that the process of the court may be abused by a plaintiff for purposes however wanton and malicious. We may suppose the case of a party harrasing the defendant under the forms of law, by maliciously suing out three writs for the same cause on the same day,* and successively arresting the defendant on all three of them: In such a case, the principle of the law allows an action, although in form it may have some novelty." The declaration, not having been specially demurred to, was upheld, on the ground that the averment, without "reasonable or probable cause," might be intended to mean, that the defendant knew he had no ground for the second arrest.

If this case be law—and there appears to be no reason to think otherwise, supported as it is by the judgment of the court, in De Medina v. Grove—it would appear clear, that an action for malicious arrest, without probable cause, will not lie, where the creditor employs either mesne or final process, except he be guilty of a malicious abuse, in which case, the question would be one of express malice; and the case of Saxon v. Castle (6 Ad. & El. 632), although the arrest complained of, was upon final process, is consistent with this view, as the judgment on which the process issued was only to be entered on a certain condition precedent being performed by the creditor, which was not bona fide done. The court held, that the action was well conceived, but arrested the judgment, there being no averment of malice, which they held to be a necessary ingredient in the action.

Independently of direct authority, the view we have been submitting, appears to follow from the principles in which this form of action is founded, and the proof necessary to sustain it. Those rules are, that if there be no probable cause, malice may be inferred, although the jury are not bound to infer it. Mitchell v. Jenkins, (5 B. & Ad. 558; S.C. Nev. & M. 301). Secondly—If there be probable cause, no amount of malice, however distinctly proved, will render the defendant liable. Per Parke, J. Mitchell v. Jenkins (5 B. & Ad. 558). If then, mesne process gives a prima facie right, or probable cause, and that, as was said in the judgment of the court, in De Medina v. Grove, the reasons are a fortiori, with respect to final process. "No amount of malice, however distinctly proved, will render the plaintiff liable." His remedy if the evidence of express malice will warrant the proceeding—must be for the abuse of the process of the court—the form of action which appears to have been adopted in Porter v. Weston, (8 Scott. 25).

The statute 7 Anne, c. 7, s. 2, 1r.* affords a remedy for injuries of this nature, by giving treble damages to the party against whom such execution issues, if it appears that the execution creditor has "wilfully, fraudulently and maliciously," over-charged him. In Mills v. Nernoy, (Cook & Alc. 81), the court held, that the three requisites of the statute must concur to complete the liability of the defendant; and that the mere circumstance of an execution being marked for a larger sum than was due, did not per se, warrant the jury in finding that it was "fraudulently, and maliciously over-marked." This is, we conceive, the same conclusion as that to be derived from an action for abuse of the process of the court, and that to which, in fact, the Court of Queen's Bench have come, in the case of Carmichael v. Limerick & Waterford Railway Company; by deciding that the gist of the action was the express malice; a decision which we submit, for the reasons stated, would not be consistent with holding it to be an action for over-marking without probable cause; in which the jury would be at liberty to infer malice.

108. Interpretation of act.

109. Act may be amended, &c.

Be it enacted, that 7 & 8 Vict. c. 103, shall be repealed, except as to any act or proceeding incident to any election petition under the said recited act, all which acts and proceedings shall have effect, and shall, save as herein-after provided, be continued and completed as if this act had not passed: provided, that this enactment shall not revive 9 G. 4, c. 22, nor so much of 43 G. 3, c. 106, and 47 G. 3, c. 14, as requires the parties appearing before any select committee to interchange lists of the votes and names of voters to which either of the parties intends to object, and statements in writing respecting the matters which either of the said parties mean to insist upon, or as provides that no witness shall be examined to anything not specified in such lists or statements.

2. That every petition presented within the time from time to time limited by the house for receiving election petitions, and complaining of an undue election or return of a member, or complaining that no return has been made according to the requisition of any writ, or complaining of the special matters contained in any such return, and which petition shall be subscribed by some person who voted or had a right to vote at the election to which the same relates, or by some person claiming to have had a right to be returned or elected thereat, or alleging himself to have been a candidate at the election, shall be deemed an election petition.

3. That before any petition shall be presented a recognizance shall be entered into by one, two, three, or four persons, as sureties for the person subscribing such petition, for the sum of £1000, in one sum, or in several sums of not less than £250 each, for the payment of all costs and expenses which shall become payable by the person subscribing the petition to any witness summoned in his behalf, or to the sitting member or other the party complained of in such petition, or to any party who may be admitted to defend such petition.

4. That every person who enters into any such recognizance shall testify upon oath in writing to be sworn at the time of entering into the said recognizance, and before the same person by whom his recognizance is taken, that he is seized or possessed of real or personal estate (or both,) above what will satisfy his debts, of the clear value of the sum for which he is bound by his said recognizance; and every such affidavit shall be annexed to the recognizance.

5. That in every such recognizance shall be mentioned the names and usual places of residence or business of the persons becoming sureties, with such other description of the sureties as may be sufficient to identify them easily; and such recognizance may be in the form or to the effect set forth in the schedule to this act, with such alteration as may be necessary for the circumstances of each case.

6. That any person by whom an election petition is signed may, instead of procuring a recognizance for the full amount of the sum herein-before required, pay into the bank of England, to the account of the speaker and examiner of recognizances, any amount of money, not being less than £250; and in such case the person by whom the petition is signed shall be required to find sureties for so much only of the sum of £1000 as the sum paid into the bank falls short of that sum; and no money shall be deemed for the purposes of this act to be paid into the bank of England until a bank receipt or certificate for the same is procured, and delivered to the examiner of recognizances.

7. That no election petition shall be received unless at the time it be endorsed by a certificate under the hand of the examiner of recognizances, that the recognizance has been entered into and received by him, with the affidavit thereunto annexed, and if the recognizance have not been taken for the whole amount, that a bank receipt or certificate for so much money as the recognizance falls short of £1000 has been delivered to him, as herein-before required.

8. That the petitioner may, at any time, withdraw the same upon giving notice in writing under his hand, or under the hand of his agent, to the Speaker, and also to the sitting member or his agent, and also to any party who may have been admitted to oppose the prayer of such petition, that it is not intended to proceed with the petition; and in such case the petitioner shall be liable to the payment of such costs and expenses as have been incurred by the sitting member or other party complained of in such petition, and also by any party admitted to oppose the prayer of such petition, to be taxed as herein-after provided.

9. That the Speaker of the House of Commons shall appoint a fit person to be examiner of recognizances; and such person shall hold his office during the pleasure of the Speaker, and shall execute the duties of his office conformably to such directions as he may receive from the Speaker.

10. That in case of the illness, temporary disability, or unavoidable absence of the examiner of recognizances, the Speaker may appoint a fit person to perform the duties of examiner of recognizances during such illness, disability, or absence; and throughout this act the expression "Examiner of Recognizances" shall be deemed to include and apply to the person so appointed.

11. That every recognizance required shall be entered into, and every affidavit shall be sworn, before the examiner of recognizances or a justice of the peace, and the said examiner, and also every justice of the peace, is empowered to take the same; and every such recognizance and affidavit taken before a justice, being duly certified by such justice, shall be delivered to the examiner of recognizances.

12. That on or before the day when any such petition is presented to the house, the names and descriptions of the sureties, as set forth in the recognizance, shall be entered in a book to be kept by the examiner of recognizances in his office; and the said book, and also the recognizance and affidavits, and the bank receipt for any money paid into the bank of England, shall be open to the inspection of all parties.

13. That any member petitioned against, or any electors petitioning and admitted parties to defend the election or return, may object to any such recognizance that the same is invalid, or that the same was not duly entered into or received by the examiner of recognizances, with the affidavit annexed as herein-before required, or on the ground that the sureties or any of them are insufficient, or that a surety is dead, or that he cannot be found or ascertained from the want of a sufficient description in the recognizance, or that a person named in the recognizance has not duly acknowledged the same; provided that the ground of objection shall be stated in writing by objecting party or his agent, and shall be delivered to the examiner of recognizances within ten days, or not later than 12 o'clock of the eleventh day, if the surety objected to reside in England, or within fourteen days, or not later than 12 o'clock of the fifteenth day after the presentation of the petition if the surety objected to reside in Scotland or Ireland: provided that if either such eleventh or such fifteenth day happen to be a Sunday, Good Friday, or Christmas day, such notice of objection may be delivered to the examiner of recognizances not later than 12 o'clock of the following day.

14. That as soon as any such statement of objection is received by the examiner of recognizances, he shall put up an acknowledgement thereof in his office, and shall appoint a day for hearing such objections, not less than three, nor more than five days from the day on which he received such statement; and the petitioner and his agent shall be allowed to examine and take copies of every such objection.

15. That at the time appointed, the examiner of recognizances shall inquire into the alleged objections, on the grounds stated in the notice of objection; and for the purpose of such inquiry the examiner of recognizances may examine upon oath any persons tendered for examination, and may also receive in evidence any affidavit relating to the matter in dispute, sworn before him, or before any master of the High Court of Chancery, or justice of the peace, each of whom is hereby authorised to take and certify such affidavit; and the examiner of recognizances may adjourn the said inquiry from time to time, until he decide on the validity of such objection, and he may award costs to be paid by either party, which costs shall be taxed and recovered as herein-after provided for the costs and expenses of prosecuting or opposing election petitions; and the decision of the examiner of recognizances shall be final and conclusive.

16. That if any surety die, and his death be stated as a ground of objection before the end of the time allowed for objecting to recognizances, the petitioner may pay into the Bank of England, on the account of the speaker and the examiner of recognizances, the sum for which the deceased surety was bound: and upon the delivery of a bank receipt for such sum to the examiner of recognizances within three days after the day on which the statement of such objection was delivered to the examiner of recognizances, the recognizances shall be deemed unobjectionable, if no other ground of objection thereto be stated.

17. That if the examiner of recognizances have received any statement of objection to the recognizances, and have decided that such recognizances are objectionable, he shall forthwith report to the speaker that such recognizances are objectionable; but if he shall have decided that such recognizances are unobjectionable, or if he have not received any such statement of objection, then, as soon as the time herein before allowed for stating any such objection has elapsed or as soon as he has decided upon the statement of objection, the examiner of recognizances shall report to the speaker that the recognizances are unobjectionable; and every such report shall be final and conclusive; and he shall make out a list of all election petitions on which he has reported that the recognizances are unobjectionable, in which list the petitions shall be arranged in the order in which they are so reported upon; and a copy of such list shall be kept in the office of the examiner of recognizances, and shall be open to the inspection of all parties.

18. That if at any time before the appointment of a select committee to try any election petition, the Speaker of the House of Commons be informed, by a certificate in writing subscribed by two of the members of the said house, of the death of any sitting member whose election or return is complained of, or of the death of any member returned upon a double return whose election or return is complained of, or that a writ of summons has been issued under the Great Seal of Great Britain to summon any such member to parliament as a Peer of Great Britain, or if the House of Commons have resolved that the seat of any such member is by law vacant, or if the House be informed by a declaration in writing subscribed by any such member, and delivered to the Speaker within fourteen days after the day on which any such petition was presented, that it is not the intention of such member to defend his election or return, in every such case notice shall be sent by the Speaker to the general committee of elections, and to the members of the Chairmen's Panel, and also to the sheriff or other returning officer for the county, city, borough, district of burghs, port or place, to which such petition relates; and such sheriff or other returning officer shall cause a true copy of such notice to be affixed on or near the door of the county hall, or town hall, or of the parish church nearest to the place where such election has usually been held; and such notice shall also be inserted, by order of the Speaker, in one of the next two London Gazettes, and shall be communicated by him to the House.

19. That at any time within 14 days after the day on which any election petition was presented, or within 21 days after the day on which any notice was inserted in the Gazette, to the effect that the seat is vacant, or that the member will not defend his election or return, or if either of the said periods expire during a prorogation of parliament, or during an adjournment of the House of Commons for the Easter or Christmas holidays, then, on or before the second day on which the House meets after such prorogation or adjournment, any person who voted or had a right to vote at the election to which the petition relates may petition the House of Commons, praying to be admitted as a party to defend such return, or to oppose the prayer of such petition; and such person shall thereupon be admitted as a party, together with the sitting member, if he be then a party against such petition, or in the room of such member if he be not then a party against the petition; and every such petition shall be referred by the house to the general committee of election herein-after mentioned.

20. That whenever the member whose election or return is so complained of, has given notice of his intention not to defend the same, he shall not be afterwards allowed to appear or act as a party against such petition, and he shall also be restrained from sitting in the House of Commons, or voting on any question until such petition has been decided upon.

21. That if in the case of an election petition complaining of a double return the member whose return is complained of in such petition have given notice as that it is not his intention to defend his return, and if no party, within the period herein-before allowed, have been admitted to defend such return, then, if there be no election petition complaining of the other member returned on such double return, the last-mentioned member or other the persons who subscribed the petition complaining of such double return may withdraw such petition by letter addressed to the Speaker; and thereupon the order for referring such petition to the general committee of elections shall be discharged, and the house shall give the necessary directions for amending the said double return, by taking off the file the indenture by which the person so declining to defend his return was returned, or otherwise, as the case may require.

22. That in the first session of every parliament, on the day after the last day allowed by the House of Commons for receiving election petitions, and in every subsequent session, as soon as convenient, the Speaker shall by warrant under his hand appoint six members of the House who are willing to serve, and against those whose return no petition is then depending, and none of whom is a petitioner complaining of any election or return, to be members of a committee to be called "The General Committee of Elections;" and every such warrant shall be laid on the table of the House, and, if not disapproved by the House in the course of the three next days on which the House meets for the despatch of business, shall take effect as an appointment of such general committee.

23. That if the house disapprove any such warrant the Speaker shall, on or before the third day on which the house meets after such disapproval, lay upon the table of the house a new warrant for the appointment of six members, qualified as aforesaid, and so from time to time until six members have been appointed not disapproved by the house.

24. That the disapproval of the warrant may be either general in respect of the constitution of the whole committee, or special in respect of any member named.

25. That the Speaker may, name in the second or any subsequent warrant any of the members named in any former warrant whose appointment has not been disapproved by the house.

DUBLIN, APRIL 21, 1849.

We are glad to find the Courts of law protecting the interests of occupying tenants, and that even in their absence—we are glad to find them construing the strict terms of an act of parliament in favor of industry, and the encouragement of agricultural exertion.

To enable the landlord, without injury to himself, to act with humanity to the tenants in the occupation of land, for the recovery of which he may have obtained an habere, the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 111, was passed; in the 8th section of this act, it is provided, "That it shall be lawful for the sheriff, or his bailiff or officer, upon the consent in writing of the lessor of the plaintiff, or the attorney of the plaintiff, to execute any writ of habere facias possessionem, in any action of ejectment, or any civil bill decree for the recovery of the possession of lands and tenements, without removing therefrom, or disturbing the possession or occupation of any undertenant or occupier, who shall, at the time of the execution of such writ or decree, sign with his or her name, or mark, attested by such sheriff, or officer, an acknowledgement according to either of the forms, Nos. 1 and 2, in the schedule to this act annexed." This section of the act enables the landlord, if so disposed, to leave the occupying tenants in possession. The schedules referred to appeared to place the tenants, as to the continuance of their occupation, entirely in the power of the landlord, the tenants being required to acknowledge, that they "held or occupied the lands and tenements now in their respective occupation, by the leave and license, and for and on behalf of, and at the will of the landlord; and that they will severally and respectively, when required by the landlord or his authorized agent or receiver, deliver up to the said landlord, or his authorized agent or receiver, the possession of the said lands and premises in their respective occupation." And under this acknowledgment it was supposed that the landlord could at once have the habere renewed, and the occupying tenants put out of possession.

The Court of Queen's Bench have held very differently in Lessee Knox v. Gildea, reported in (11 Irish Law & Equity Reports, p. 198). An application was made for liberty to renew an habere, where tenants were allowed to remain in possession under the provisions of this act. It was held that, "an application should have been made to the tenants to deliver up possession, or else a notice served on them, of the intended application to the court," and when at length, on the affidavit of service of the conditional order, and of the demand of possession, the order was made absolute—it was made so, with a stay of execution until the 1st of November, on the ground that in the interval which had elapsed, the tenant might have cropped the land. Landlords may complain of this decision, and look upon it as a breach of faith with them, that they were induced by the statute to permit the occupying tenants to remain in the possession of their holdings, distinctly on the terms, that they would be enabled to recover possession of them at a moment's notice, when an opportunity might occur of disposing of them to advantage, and which opportunity might be lost by the obstacle thus occasioned by the court.

When it is considered, that the leaving of the occupying tenants thus in possession, is at the option of the landlord in the first instance, and that the object of the statute was to protect the tenant from unnecessary hardship; the decision cannot be objected to. To induce a tenant to crop his land, by thus leaving him in possession, and to enable a landlord to eject him the moment he had his land so cropped, would be to expose him to more serious injury, than that from which this statute was enacted to protect him.

We fear, however, that this decision, equitable as it is, will have the effect of rendering the statute inoperative: a landlord having obtained an habere, after, perhaps, tedious and expensive proceedings, will hardly be induced to adopt a course by which his actual possession of the lands would be deferred in all likelihood for another year.

To the Editor of the Irish Jurist.

SIR.—I send a copy of observations and suggestions which I lately forwarded to a Member of Parliament, and which, it appears to me, may not be out of place to publish in your paper, if you consider them worth insertion.

Your obedient Servant,
S.

Observations and Suggestions as to the Transfer of the Equity Jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer to the Court of Chancery.

THE proposed change (which, as to England, has been effected by the 5th Vic. c. 5) is desirable, on the grounds recited in the preamble of that statute, which applies equally to the Irish Court, in which the law business exceeds in extent that of any of the law courts.

2ndly. Because it is of great public importance that one uniform system of equity should be administered in this country :

Instead of, as at present, witnessing that frequent conflict of opinion between the decisions of the two Irish courts on many points of great importance, and, in particular, on the construction of modern and recent Acts of Parliament, so derogatory to the character of the general administration of justice.

3rdly. Because, owing to the quantity of law business (which is largely in arrear), the court can devote but a short period, during the law Terms, to equity business ; and, as the Chief Baron usually sits at Nisi Prius during the Equity sittings after Term, cases involving any serious point, which may have been partly heard during the Term, will not be proceeded with in his absence, and are thus postponed, from Term to Term, to the delay and loss of suitors.

4thly. Because the administration of law and equity by the same court has been found inconvenient, and tends greatly to delay both classes of suitors, and because of the loss of time arising from conferences and consultations on the bench, incident to its being composed of several persons.

5thly. Because the practice of the Court of Exchequer, even with the recent reforms (under the acts 6 & 7 Vict. c. 55 and 78, and the General Orders thereunder), is, in many respects, more dilatory, unsatisfactory, and expensive, than that of the Court of Chancery.

It appears, indeed, to be conceded on all hands, that the proposed change would be advantageous to the public, and the sole ground of objection to its adoption seems to be one of finance—that it would entail expense which the present state of the revenue cannot afford to meet. Now, this is manifestly erroneous in fact ; and the following statement shews that the alteration may be effected, not only without loss, but be actually made a means to add to the public income.

Except the Chief and Second Remembrancer, and the Accountant-General and his clerk, the officers of the Equity side of the Exchequer are paid by fees, whilst in the Court of Chancery the officers (save the examiners and secretaries) are paid fixed salaries, and the fees received are accounted for to the public fund, or, in many instances, are paid in the form of Equity fund stamp duties.

By a transfer of the business to Chancery, the fees, and stamp duties in respect of fees, would thenceforward go to the public account, and the following officers would be dispensed with (subject, of course, to their right to life compensation, in case they might not be appointed to offices in Chancery):—

	Salaries or Estimated Emoluments.
The Second Remembrancer (salary)	£1,000 0 0
His clerk, - - - - -	50 0 0
The Registrar and clerk, say, -	1,500 0 0
Assistant-Registrar and clerk, say, -	750 0 0
(The Registrar's ordinary clerks might be transferred to the corresponding offices in Chancery.)
Two Examiners and clerks, - - -	1,800 0 0
Secondary and Clerk of the Writs, -	950 0 0
Their clerks, - - - - -	200 0 0

For want of returns, the amount of the emoluments of officers paid by fees at present receivable, are stated from general reputation, and, as is believed, under the mark. The exact amount may be ascertained by the returns furnished by those officers to the Treasury, pursuant to the act 6 & 7 Vic. c. 55, ss. 13 & 14. By a late return to the House of Commons, the gross income of the above officers is £10,441 2s. 10d.; but it will be found, that in this, the officers have included the amount of compensation to which they are for life entitled, in consequence of the diminution of fees occasioned by the 6 & 7 Vic. c. 55, which was estimated on the average of the fees received by cash for the seven years previous to November, 1842, and which included the great temporary additions caused by the proceedings for the recovery of tithe composition. Thus the income of the Secondary is returned as £8,069 17s. 4d.

The fees payable in Chancery for the same quantum of business, would realise to the consolidated fund, a much larger amount than the corresponding fees in the Exchequer—the office fees being in many instances much higher in the former court, e. g. a common order of two sheets in the Exchequer, costs 3s. 1d. (4 Geo. 4, cap. 70, Table 4). In Chancery, 12s. 6d. (general order, 25th January, 1837), although owing to the difference of practice, the expense to suitors is nearly the same in both courts. The present Chief Remembrancer, and his Examiner might be transferred to Chancery; the former as a fifth Master at his present salary, (£2000,) with a right to succeed, on a vacancy occurring amongst the present Masters.

The fiscal and Revenue duties at present performed by the Chief Remembrancer, might easily be transferred to and transacted by the Master, at the law side of the court, who has scarcely any duty to perform beyond a general superintendence over the other officers.

The Court of Chancery, with the addition of a fifth Master, could with its present machinery, beyond doubt, transact the whole Equity business of Ireland. There is no arrear of business in the Court of Chancery, or the Rolls Court. The Master of the Rolls concluded his business on the 13th of March last; the Lord Chancellor, with an unusually heavy list, about two days later,—and if those courts should continue their sittings for even near the periods during which the English Equity Judges sit, there can be no doubt, but that the entire Equity business could be by them efficiently discharged without the necessity of creating a Vice-Chancellor, and if so, an addition of at least £6000 a-year, would result to the Revenue.

The present staff of Chancery, (with the addition of a few copying clerks, who would be remunerated by the increased fees on the additional business), is unquestionably adequate to transact the entire business, including the proposed addition.

Suppose, however, it should turn out that an additional Equity Judge would be required, the expense thereby to be entailed would be:—

A Vice-Chancellor. (Salary and jurisdiction, similar to that of the Master of the Rolls,) -	£3,969	4	7
An additional Registrar, (the Exchequer Registrar to be the first, and the future patronage of this and the other offices, to be vested in the Vice-Chancellor), -	1000	0	0
Crier and train-bearer, -	140	0	0
A clerk in court, (same as Rolls Court, and an Exchequer officer, might receive the first appointment), -	600	0	0
	£5709	4	7

Thus even creating an additional Judge, the charge could be effected without loss to the consolidated fund.

Again, a Vice-Chancellor might be selected from the Barons of the Exchequer, and that vacancy filled up by a transfer of one Judge from the Common Pleas—for the business of which three Judges would seem sufficient; and a Queen's Counsel might be selected to act, as is frequently the case, as a Judge of Assize.

A BILL INTITULED AN ACT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW OF BANKRUPTCY IN IRELAND.

1. Date of commencement of this act.
2. Laws at variance with this act repealed.
3. Petitioning creditor's bond may be dispensed with.
4. Person against whom a commission has issued on proof of probable cause for believing that he is about to quit Ireland, or to remove or conceal his goods with intent to defraud creditors, may be arrested, and shall also have authority to seize his books, papers, monies, goods and chattels, where-soever they may be found, &c.

5. Any person so arrested, or whose books, &c., are seized, may apply for his discharge forthwith, or that the petitioning creditor do shew cause why his books, &c., should not be delivered up. Commissioner may make such order as seems to him fit. Order may be appealed from.

6. Any person so arrested may apply for his discharge forthwith. Commissioner may discharge the person or not. Order of commissioner may be appealed from.

7. No person liable upon an act committed more than 12 months prior to issuing of commission.

8. Act of bankruptcy committed within a year of the issuing of a commission whether prior or subsequent to petitioning creditor's debt, sufficient to support adjudication.

9. Requisite amount of petitioning creditors debt. For single debt of such creditor, or of two or more partners £50, of two creditors £70, three or more creditors £100.

12. Manner of proceeding on summons of trader by a creditor.

13. Trader not attending summons, or refusing to admit the demand, and not making deposition of belief of a good defence thereto, and not paying or compounding within a certain time, or giving bond for payment, to be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy.

14. Trader signing an admission of demand in form prescribed, and not paying, securing or compounding within a certain time, an act of bankruptcy.

15. Trader admitting part only of a demand, and not making deposition of a good defence to the residue and not paying, securing, or compounding for sum admitted, and as to residue not paying or compounding or entering into bond to pay any sum recovered with costs, an act of bankruptcy.

16. What shall be deemed a refusal of admission of debt. Commissioner may enlarge the time for admission of demand.

17. Admission of debt signed elsewhere than in court, if attested by attorney of trader may be filed, and have the same force as an admission signed by a trader on his appearance before commissioners under the summons.

18. Trader summoned on affidavit of debt to have such costs as the commissioners shall think fit. Or commissioner may direct the costs to abide the event of any action for the debt.

19. Wherever a creditor plaintiff shall not recover the amount sworn to in his affidavit of debt filed against a trader, if such affidavit be made for such amount without probable cause, the trader defendant shall be entitled to costs.

20. Trader not paying, securing, or compounding for a judgment debt, upon which the plaintiff might sue out execution, within 14 days after notice requiring payment, an act of bankruptcy.

21. Trader disobeying order of any court of equity, or order in bankruptcy or lunacy, for payment of money, after service of order for payment on a peremptory day fixed, an act of bankruptcy.

22. Trader filing a declaration of insolvency in the office of the secretary of bankrupts, an act of bankruptcy.

23. Secret transfer of goods shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy.

24. Transfer of goods and chattels when to be deemed a secret transfer within the meaning of last section. Proviso to save right of bona fide purchaser or holder for value without notice. Proviso for assignment of vessels under 3 & 4, Wm. IV. cap. 55.

25. Filing petition for arrangement between a trader debtor and his creditors, with the concurrence of a certain number thereof to be an act of bankruptcy if petition dismissed.

26. Manner of making a debtor a bankrupt by affidavit of debt and notice to pay. Creditor to file an affidavit of debt, and serve notice requiring payment within 21 days.

27. If commission not proceeded on by petitioning creditor within 3 days, any other creditor may proceed on it.

28. If bankrupt shall not proceed to dispute the commission and prosecute with effect, the Gazette to be conclusive evidence of the bankruptcy, as against the bankrupt and against persons whom the bankrupt might have sued had he not been adjudged bankrupt. Saving present rights for which any proceedings are pending.

29. Provision for debtor to the bankrupt's estate paying the debt into court when sued by the assignees within the time for bankrupt to dispute.

30. One or two persons being merchants, brokers, or accountants, or persons who have been engaged in trade, or resident in Ireland, shall be chosen by Lord Chancellor to act as official assignees. Their duty.

31. Commissioners may take security by recognizance or of Guarantee Society.

32. Official assignees to receive bankrupt's estate and effects. How to apply same.

33. Proviso restricting the authority of the official assignee.

34. Lord Chancellor may remove official assignees, and may fill up vacancy in their number.

35. Power to appoint official assignees to act with the existing assignees under commissioners now pending, and to whom the latter shall deliver over effects.

36. Official assignee may act until creditors assignee appointed. May sell the property, if commissioner so order. And make allowance to bankrupt for his support. Property vested in official assignee to go to his successor.

37. To exempt official assignee from personal responsibility.

38. Debtor and creditor account to be furnished by official assignee to creditors assignee before dividend.

39. Remuneration to official assignee.

40. Pay, half-pay, and pensions of bankrupts to be applicable for the benefit of creditors.

41. Audits and dividends to be had and made whenever the commissioner thinks fit after the time appointed for the bankrupt's last examination.

42. Commissioner may order three month's wages or salary to clerks or servants.

43. Commissioner may order wages not exceeding 40s. to labourer or workman.

44. Search-warrants may be granted.

45. In cases of member of a firm being bankrupt, the commissioners, upon application, may authorize actions or suits in name of the assignee of the bankrupt and the remaining partner. Partner to have notice of such application, and may shew cause against it. Commissioner may direct partner to have part of proceeds.

46. Bankrupt not surrendering or submitting to be examined, or making discovery of his estate and effects, or not delivering up his estate, books, &c. or concealing, &c., to the value of £10, guilty of felony, and liable to transportation or imprisonment with or without hard labour.

47. Commissioner may enlarge the time for the bankrupt surrendering himself. Commissioner may order that bankrupt shall be free from arrest for three months after final examination.

48. Bankrupt destroying or falsifying any of his books, &c., or making false entries guilty of a misdemeanour, and liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour.

70. Commissioners may permit mortgagees to bid at sale.

71. Goods and chattels under seizure by virtue of attachment shall, upon demand, be delivered up to any person appointed by the commissioner.

72. Before whom affidavits are to be sworn.

73. Rules to be made for regulating the forms of proceedings and practice to be observed in prosecuting commissions.

74. Warrants to be under hand and seal, and every summons to be in writing under the hand of a commissioner.

75. How summons may be served where the party is keeping out of the way. Delivery of copy of notice or summons to the wife or servant or some adult inmate, shall be equivalent to personal service.

76. Punishment of persons giving false evidence, or swearing or affirming anything which shall be false.

77. Application of forfeitures.

78. All bills of solicitors and attorneys to be taxed by one of the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy, subject to review.

79. Bills of auctioneers, appraisers, valuers, and accountants, to be settled in the same manner.

80. Power to commissioner with consent of creditors to remove creditors assignee, and appoint another in his stead.

81. 6 W. 4, c. 14. Personal and real estate of bankrupt to vest in the new assignee by virtue of appointment. The removed assignee shall fully account.

82. Actions or suits not be abated by removal of assignees.

83. Costs may be awarded by commissioner of bankrupt. Persons brought up by warrant may be ordered to pay the costs of bringing them up.

84. Orders of commissioners of bankrupt for payment of money or costs, to be enforced by writs out of Chancery.

85. Persons capable of giving evidence respecting trading or act of bankruptcy; or suspected of having bankrupt's property and being in prison, may be brought for examination under warrant from commissioners of bankrupt.

86. Bankrupt in custody in England or Scotland or Ireland to be brought before the commissioners.

87. Depositions, &c. under commissions may be entered of record without order of Lord Chancellor being necessary. Certificate of entry endorsed to be evidence of the entry. Fee of 1s. payable on search for any such record.

88. Where second or other commission is issued against one or more partners, proceedings under second commission shall be stayed and form part of first commission if Chancellor so order.

89. Three-fifths in number and value of creditors of bankrupt may accept a composition.

90. Mode of voting in deciding upon such composition.

91. How notice shall be given to the creditors.

92. Creditors served with notice, bound to accept the composition agreed to, whether they shall or not have proved their debts under the commission.

93. Any debtor unable to meet his engagements with his creditors and unable to obtain their consent to a deed of composition, may with the concurrence of two-thirds in number and value petition the commissioners.

94. Petition to be in form in Schedule I, and supported by affidavit.

95. Commissioners privately to examine into matter of petition, and if satisfied may allow the same de bene esse, and appoint meeting of creditors, and may grant protection during examination, and after allowance de bene esse of petition.

96. How notice shall be given to the creditors.

97. Commissioner to examine into matter of petition. If resolution of creditors not confirmed, petition shall be dismissed and protection cease.

98. Commissioners may renew protection, and if petitioning debtor be in custody, may order release, &c.

99. Commissioner to appoint a registrar of the court, or one of the principal petitioning creditors to preside at the meeting of the creditors.

100. If, at first meeting, major part in number and value, or nine-tenths in value, or nine-tenths in number, whose debts exceed £20 assent, another meeting to be called.

101. If, at second meeting, three-fifths in number and value of all the creditors present agree to accept,

&c., resolution to be binding on all, provided one full third in number and value be present.

102. Creditors to vote according to balance due to them on account fairly stated.

103. Resolution to be submitted to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners if they think it reasonable after hearing creditors for and against, to approve and confirm the same, and to cause it to be filed, and to grant certificate of protection.

104. Estate to vest in trustee if any be appointed.

105. Resolution to be enrolled, and copy of it to be evidence.

106. Trustee to file account every six months, or oftener if required.

107. If petitioning debtor has not made a true discovery, &c. he may be summoned and examined.

108. If any difficulty arise as to execution of resolution &c. a special meeting may be called.

109. When resolution or agreement has been carried into effect, commissioner to give petitioning debtor a certificate thereof and such certificate to operate as a certificate of conformity.

110. Commissioners on being satisfied that trustee has fully performed his trust, to give him a certificate thereof, and such certificate to be a full release and acquittance for all matters done by such trustee.

111. Commissioners of the Treasury authorized to grant superannuation allowances to commissioners and registrars of Court of Bankruptcy in Ireland. Accounts of such allowances to be laid before Parliament.

112. Nothing contained in act 3 and 4 Vict. c. 105, s. 22, shall entitle a judgment creditor to any preference over other creditors. Saving such judgments as have been the subject of some legal decision before the passing of this Act.

113. Recites 3 and 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 12. Judgments shall before 1st day of 1849 be entered on all warrants of attorney executed on or before 1st November, 1840, if not already entered. Otherwise such warrants of attorney shall in certain cases, be deemed fraudulent and void.

114. A book or index of the names, descriptions and additions of persons granting warrants of attorney to be kept which shall be open to inspection on payment of sixpence.

115. Lord Chancellor to settle fees, &c.

116. Construction of act.

117. Act may be altered this session.

26. That after the appointment of the general committee every member appointed shall continue to be a member of the committee until the end of that session of parliament, or until he cease to be a member of the House of Commons, or until he resign his appointment (which he may do by letter to the Speaker,) or until the general committee report that he is disabled by continued illness, or until the committee be dissolved.

27. That in every case of vacancy in the general committee of elections the Speaker, on the first day on which the house meets after such vacancy is known by him, shall make known the vacancy to the house, and thereupon all proceedings of the general committee shall be suspended until the vacancy is supplied.

28. That if the general committee of elections report to the house that, by reason of the continued absence of more than two of its members, or by reason of irreconcilable disagreement of opinion, the said committee is unable to proceed in the discharge of its duties, or if the house resolve that the general committee of elections be dissolved, the general committee shall be thereby forthwith dissolved.

29. That every appointment to supply a vacancy in the general committee, and every re-appointment of the general committee after the dissolution thereof, shall be made by the Speaker by warrant, laid upon the table of the house on or before the third day on which the house meets after the dissolution of the committee or notification of the vacancy, and the warrant shall be subject to the disapproval of the house, as is provided in the case of the first warrant for the appointment of the general committee; and upon any re-appointment of the general committee the Speaker may, re-appoint any of the members of the former committee who are then willing and not disqualified to serve on it.

30. That the Speaker shall appoint the time and place of the first meeting of the general committee of elections, and the committee shall meet at the time and place so appointed; but no member shall act upon such committee until he have been sworn at the table of the house, truly and faithfully to perform the duties belonging to a member of the said committee, to the best of his judgment and ability, without fear or favour.

31. That no business shall be transacted by the general committee of elections unless four members be then present; and no appointment of a select committee by the general committee, shall be of force unless at the least four members then present of the general committee agree in the appointment.

32. That the general committee shall make regulations for the order and manner of conducting the business to be transacted by them.

33. That the general committee shall be attended by one of the committee clerks of the house selected for that purpose by the clerk of the house, and such committee clerk shall make a minute of all the proceedings, in such form and manner as shall be directed by the committee, and a copy of the minutes so kept shall be laid before the House of Commons.

34. That if at the time of the dissolution or suspension of the proceedings of the general committee there be any business appointed to be transacted by such general committee on any certain day, the Speaker may adjourn the transaction of such business to such other day as to him seems convenient.

35. That every member more than 60 years old shall be excused from serving on election committees, provided that on or before the reading over of the names of such excused members, or upon his afterwards becoming entitled to make such claim, he claim to be excused, by declaring in his place, or in writing under his hand delivered to the clerk at the table, that he is more than 60 years old; but no member shall be so excused who does not claim to be excused before he is chosen to serve.

36. That in the first session of every parliament, on the next meeting of the house after the last day allowed for receiving election petitions, and in every subsequent session on the next meeting of the house after the Speaker has laid on the table his warrant for the appointment of the general committee of elections, the clerk of the house shall read over the names of all the members who have so claimed to be excused.

37. That every member having leave of absence shall be excused from serving on election committees; and if any member offer any other excuse, either at the reading over of the said names or at any other time, the substance of the allegations shall be taken down by the clerk, in order that the same may be afterwards entered on the journals, and the opinion of the house shall then be taken thereon; and if the house resolve that the said member ought to be excused he shall be excused from serving on election committees for such time as to the house seems fit, but no member shall be so excused who does not claim to be excused before he is chosen to serve; and every member who has served on one election committee, and who within seven days after such committee has made its final report notifies to the clerk of the general committee his claim to be excused from so serving again, shall be excused during the remainder of the session, unless the house resolve, upon the report of the general committee, that the number of members who have not so served is insufficient; but no member shall be deemed to have served on an election committee who on account of inability or accident has been excused from attending the same.

38. That every member who is a petitioner complaining of an undue election or return, or against whose return a petition is depending, shall be disqualified to serve on election committees during the continuance of such disqualification.

39. That the clerk of the House of Commons shall make out an alphabetical list of all the members, omitting the names of such members as have claimed to be excused from serving on election committees; and the clerk shall also distinguish in such list the name of every member then excused or disqualified, and shall also note in the list every cause of such excuse or disqualification, and the duration thereof; and such list shall be printed, and distributed with the votes of the house, and the names of all the members so omitted shall be also printed, and distributed with the votes.

40. That during three days next after the day of the distribution of such corrected list further corrections may be made by leave of the Speaker, if it appear that any name has been improperly left in or struck out, or that there is any other error in such list.

41. That the list so corrected shall be referred to the general committee of elections; and the general committee shall select, in their discretion, six, eight, ten, or twelve members, whom they think duly qualified to serve as chairmen of election committees; and the members so selected shall be formed into a separate panel, to be called the chairmen's panel, which shall be reported to the house; and while the name of any member is upon the chairmen's panel he shall not serve on an election committee otherwise than as chairman; and every member on the chairmen's panel shall be bound to continue upon it till the end of the session, or he cease to be a member of the house, or until, by leave of the house, he be discharged from continuing upon the chairmen's panel: provided that every member of the chairmen's panel who has served on one or more election committees, and who notifies to the clerk of the general committee of elections his claim to be discharged, shall be so discharged; and every such member shall be excused from serving upon any election committee, either as chairman or otherwise, during the remainder of the session; but no member of the chairmen's panel shall be deemed to have served on an election committee who on account of inability or accident has been excused from attending the same.

42. That after the chairmen's panel has been so selected, the general committee shall divide the members on such list into five panels, as to them seems most convenient, but so that each panel may contain as nearly as may be the same number of members, and they shall report to the house the division so made; and the clerk shall decide by lot the order of the panels so settled, and shall distinguish each of them by a number denoting the order in which they were drawn; and the panels shall then be returned to the general committee of elections, and shall be the panels from which members shall be chosen to serve on election committees.

43. That the general committee of elections shall correct the said panels by striking out of them the name of every member who ceases to be a member of the house, or who from time to time becomes entitled and claims to be wholly excused from serving on election committees, and by inserting in one of the panels to be chosen by the general committee, at their discretion, the name of every new member of the house not entitled and not having claimed to be wholly excused, and shall also distinguish in the manner aforesaid in the said panels the names of the members for the time being excused or disqualified for any of the reasons aforesaid; and the general committee shall, as often as they think fit, report to the house the panels as corrected; and as often as the general committee reports the said panels to the house they shall be printed, and distributed with the votes.

44. That when leave of absence for a limited time has been granted by the house to any member, the general committee of elections may transfer the name of such member from the panel in which it has been placed to some other panel subsequent in rotation, having regard to the length of time for which such leave of absence has been granted, and to the number of select committees then about to be appointed.

45. That whenever any member of the chairmen's panel ceases to be a member of the house, or is by leave of the house discharged from continuing upon the chairmen's panel, or is so discharged by reason of service, the general committee shall select another member to be placed upon the chairmen's panel; and in case it at any time appear to the general committee that the chairmen's panel is too small, they may select two, four, or six additional members to place upon it, so nevertheless that the chairmen's panel shall not at any time consist of more than eighteen members, without the leave of the house first obtained.

46. That all election petitions received by the house shall be referred to the general committee of elections, for the purpose of choosing select committees, to try such petitions; and the Speaker shall communicate to the house and to the general committee every report by the examiner of recognizances to him concerning the recognizances to any election petition; and in every case in which any election petition is withdrawn, or the examiner of recognizances reports to the Speaker that the recognizances are objectionable, the order for referring such petition to the general committee of elections shall be discharged, and no further proceeding shall be had upon such petition; and the general committee shall make out a list of all election petitions in which the examiner of recognizances has reported to the Speaker that the recognizances are unobjectionable, and in which the proceedings are not suspended, in which list the petitions shall be arranged in the order in which the were so reported upon; and in every case in which the proceedings in any petition inserted in such list are afterwards suspended the petition shall be struck out of the list, and shall be again inserted at the bottom of the list at the end of such suspension of proceedings.

47. That when notice of the death or vacancy of the seat of any member petitioned against, or that it is not the intention of such member to defend his election or return, is given to the general committee of elections by the Speaker, the general committee shall suspend their proceedings in the matter of the petition referred to in such notice, until 21 days after the day on which notice of such death or vacancy, or intention not to defend, has been inserted in the Gazette, under the provision herein-before contained, unless the petition of some person claiming to be admitted as a party in the room of such member be sooner referred to them.

48. That when more than one election petition relating to the same election or return are referred to the general committee of elections, they shall suspend their proceedings in the matter of all such petitions until the report of the examiner of recognizances upon each of such petitions, is received by them; and upon receipt of the last of such reports they shall place such petitions at the bottom of the then list of election petitions, and such petitions shall be dealt with as one petition.

49. That the general committee of elections shall choose the committees to try the election petitions in the order in which such petitions stand in such list, and they shall determine how many committees shall be chosen in each week for trying such petitions, and the days on which they will meet for choosing such committees, having regard to the number of select committees then sitting, and to the whole number of such committees then to be appointed, and they shall report to the house from time to time the days appointed by them for choosing such committees.

50. That if parliament is prorogued after any election petition has been presented, but before the appointment of a select committee to try such petition, the general committee of elections appointed in the following session shall, within two days after their first meeting, in case the sureties have been then reported unobjectionable, appoint a day and hour for selecting a committee to try the petition so standing over; provided that if the number of petitions so standing be so great that the times for selecting committees to try the whole thereof cannot, in the judgment of the general committee, be appointed within two days after their first meeting, the said general committee shall, within two days after their first meeting, appoint the times for selecting committees to try so many of the said petitions as the said general committee deems convenient, and shall afterwards, as soon as conveniently may be, appoint the times for selecting the committees to try the remainder of such petitions.

51. That notice of the time and place at which the committee will be chosen to try any election petition shall be published with the votes, not less than 14 days before the day on which such committee is appointed to be chosen; and in case the conduct of the returning officer is complained of, such notice shall be sent to him through the post, not less than 14 days before the day on which such committee is appointed to be chosen; and every such notice shall direct all parties interested to attend the general committee of elections, by themselves or their agents, at the time and place appointed for choosing the select committee; and if (after any such notice has been published with the votes, or sent to the returning officer as aforesaid,) the proceedings in the matter of such petition become suspended, notice of such suspension shall be published with the votes; and in case the returning officer is complained of, such notice shall be sent to him through the post.

52. That if notice of the death or vacancy of the seat of any member petitioned against, or that it is not the intention of such member to defend his election or return, have been inserted in the Gazette, by order of the Speaker, and no party has been admitted to defend such election or return, then, if the conduct of the returning officer is not complained of, it shall not be necessary to insert such petition at the bottom of the then list of petitions; but the general committee of elections shall meet for choosing the select committee to try such petition after the expiration of the time allowed for parties to come in to defend such election or return, and not less than one day's notice of the time and place appointed for choosing such committee shall be given in the votes; and in such case it shall not be necessary to deliver to the clerk of the general committee of elections a list of the voters intended to be objected to, as herein-after is required.

53. That the general committee of elections may change the day and hour appointed for choosing a select committee to try any election petition, and appoint some subsequent day and hour, if it be expedient so to do, giving notice in the votes of the day and hour so appointed; and in every case in which any such change is made by them they shall forthwith report the same to the house, with their reasons.

54. That notice shall be published with the votes, of the petitions for each week, and of the panel from which committees will be chosen to try such petitions, and each panel shall serve for a week, beginning with the panel first drawn, and continuing so in rotation in the order in which they were drawn, and not reckoning those weeks in which no select committee is appointed to be chosen.

Sir,
“I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has some advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture; it is susceptible of a very high polish. It does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character.”

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—NOTICE OF MOTION.

“Mr. Osborne.—Select Committee to enquire into the state of the law, as respects the appointment of Receivers of the Courts of Chancery and Equity Exchequer in Ireland, and the effect of the present laws and regulations of the said Courts, in the management of estates under their control; and how far the same has conduced to the improvement of the said estates, and the condition of the tenantry, or the contrary.”

In a very few days, Mr. Osborne will move for a Committee of the House of Commons, to enquire into the system adopted by the Court of Chancery in the management of estates under its control, with the ultimate object of proposing a plan for its amendment.

We copy above the notice of motion, as it appears in the parliamentary papers, and we can entertain no doubt whatever that the Committee will be appointed. Every person acquainted with the subject, admits the hugeness of the evil of the present system, and the desirableness of its reform. We have from time to time shewn how pernicious it has been to owner, occupier, creditor, and the country.

It was adopted by the court under the extraordinary hallucination that its authority would be but short-lived, and that any description of management would answer for a temporary purpose; that, in short, estates only required an ad interim protection—provided they were kept safely, it mattered little how they were kept. The tediousness of Chancery proceedings has long been proverbial, and property once under the control of the court, was long before the day of its emancipation came—emancipation from a dominion the most cumbrous, the most costly, the most unimproving, the most deadly it was possible to conceive.

Sir Edward Sugden endeavoured to reform Chancery practice, to abridge the period for the conduct of a suit, to check jobbing in the appointment of Receivers, to establish a code of rules for their guidance, and did, in fact, compile an admirable set of orders for the management of the court practice, in its various ramifications. But much more was required.

There is no lightning speed for the Court of Chancery. Causes, from the inertness of parties conducting them, will still “drag their slow length” along, and estates will still for years upon years either be subjected to the present wasting system of receiverships, or to an improved one. Not merely is this to be expected, but from the recent course of legislation, which makes it easy to encumber, difficult to sell, when the reverse would be right legislation, the entire encumbered property of Ireland seems likely to fall an easy victim to the Court of Chancery. The increase of properties placed under its control since 1835—when the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 55, was passed—has been inordinately great; it now shows a rental of one million and a half sterling, and a surface of country covering nearly one-ninth of the whole island.

The return of last session, from which we have so often quoted, is indeed an instructive document; it was the largest ever yet presented to parliament, the bare expense of printing it was, as estimated, over £1000. To save the country this expense, it has not been printed in full, and the little tabular summary taken from it gives a most inadequate idea of the facts capable of being developed; but suggests a few salient points. We are satisfied there is a mine of information to be not gleaned, but gathered, from the document itself, and we trust to see it printed in extenso, or in the form of a digest.

Much knowledge can be, however, derived from the precis to which we have alluded.

Properties coming under the court free from arrear, at once change their nature; and the column of arrears in the Receiver's account, soon becomes greater than that of receipts; on the average, increasing from the date of his appointment, as we have shewn, p. 56, eleven fold.

And this loss accrues to the estate, whilst the tenants, deprived of a fostering hand, cease to thrive. How could they thrive, when over a rental of nine hundred thousand per annum, not one shilling is expended on improvements? How could they thrive, when they live under a Court which makes them pay £10 for a lease, and gives that lease but for seven years, pending the cause? The Court thus not only does not make improvements, but renders it hopeless that a tenant will improve. He has no fixed interest in the soil, and how can it be expected that he will expend money upon a farm, when his tenure is so short-lived and so insecure?

Again, from its centralization, the Court cannot assist by employment. Thus, no employment, no improvement, no permanency, are afforded by the ad interim proprietor.

If Mr. Osborne's Committee does no more than alter this state of things, it will do much. Why should not the Court do, in causes, what they do in minor matters? The Chancellor—we presume, so convinced of the evils of the present seven years' leasing system—by a very recent general order, has directed, that, in all lunacy and minor matters, leases should be granted for a fixed period, even for a term of 21 years. The same power should be exercised in all cases. This reform is exceedingly simple.

So is that of dispensing with the heavy cost for leases. At present the tenant is required to enter into recognizances himself, and two sureties, for payment of the rent. This stringency is not required in private estates, where rents are vastly better paid; and the practice should be abolished, and a much more wholesome one substituted, of giving a summary remedy by eviction in case of non-payment of rent. At present there is an absolute encouragement held out to the tenant to fall into arrear, the rent, according to the practice of the Court, not being demandable for five months until after it has become due. This is a senseless practice; the Receiver has no power to stir during that interval, except by special application, on a statement of facts. He should have a discretionary power to collect when he can, but not to keep the money one hour beyond its receipt. Thus, he would not be urged on by an improper desire to collect money and turn it to his own use until the day of accounting came, and would be, at the same time, invested with a power, which, in case of fraud or fraudulent preference, it is most desirable for the Court, and the sureties for the tenants, the Receiver should have.

The present system of accounting is also most expensive, unsatisfactory, and objectionable. Neither creditor, nor owner, nor any party interested, can know anything of the management of the property, or of the progress made in the receipt of the rents, until the Receiver comes to pass his accounts; and is even then unable to scrutinize, investigate, or object, without incurring the expense of taking out a copy of the account, and appearing by his solicitor in the Master's office.

This requires to be altogether altered and reformed. Both owner and creditor have a right to the fullest, easiest information, and that the accounts of an estate under the management of the Court should be kept in the plainest and clearest manner, and that they should at all times be open to the inspection of every party interested in the cause or matter.

The return also shews the enormous amount allowed annually in costs, and which, we think, an analysis of the return would prove, falls short of the actual amount.

It is impossible to suppose that a more inexpensive system cannot be devised, than the present,—say, £30,000 for costs, and £50,000 for Receivers' fees,—£80,000 a-year. We affirm, the properties might be better managed for one-half the amount.

The Committee must grapple with this branch of the subject; this must be their peculiar duty. They will see that the present body of Receivers are not men, generally speaking, at all adapted for their duties. How is it possible that practising barristers, apothecaries, or attorneys, residing in Dublin, can efficiently discharge the onerous duties of the management of landed property in Ireland? And the great majority of Chancery Receivers are of such a class, or, if not, men totally unconnected with agriculture or the management of land.

At present the Receivers are a multitudinous mass, indiscriminately selected, distinct heads over small properties, or if over large ones, often non-resident, whilst their bailiffs are a low, uneducated class. It may be true, that as human nature is constituted, the duty of a Receiver will be best performed where the remuneration is on an ad valorem scale, and that object may be kept in view as a premium to industry; but in our judgment there should be a fixed salary, and the situation dependant upon the efficient discharge of the duties. What a happy change from the present system, if the local manager were a good agriculturist, and a resident moral agent. This is perfectly practicable, and forms one of the principal features of the proposed change. Estates under the Court of Chancery are now confessedly the most mismanaged and uncared for in Ireland—perhaps on the face of the whole habitable globe—they are hot-beds of destitution, covering with a blight every adjacent property. Under the system we propose they would be pattern estates; agriculture, instead of relapsing, would progress; the tenantry would not die of destitution; the property given in pledge to the court would either be restored to the owner in an improved condition, or be sold, not as now at a depreciated, but at an enhanced value. Thus creditor and debtor, and the country at large, would be alike benefitted.

How excellent a change, and how easy of accomplishment. We shall dwell no longer on gloomy retrospects; the evils have been great, they must be abated; we now look forward with the energy of hope to see them struck down and for ever.

In a former number of this journal, (ante, p. 146, Mia.) we considered the question, what or whether there was any warranty of title annexed to a contract—not under seal—for the sale of land. The result we then conceived to be deducible from the cases, was, that an implied covenant or contract in law was created of an ability to give that interest in the land the vendor proposed to give. We now propose to consider the analogous question, as arising from the sale of specific chattels, in which the same rule, if not applied by the existing law, we trust will ere long be adopted as a settled principle.

In a recent case, Morley v. Attenborough, (13 Jur. 282,) the question was raised, whether the law annexed to the sale of a specific chattel an implied agreement on the part of the vendor, of an ability in him to convey, or, as stated by Mr. Baron Parke, “Where there is a bargain and sale of a specific, ascertained chattel, which operates to transmit the property, and nothing is said about title, what is the legal effect of that contract? Does the contract necessarily import, unless the contrary be expressed, that the vendor has a good title, or has it merely the effect of transferring such title as the vendor has?”

The facts on which the question arose were as follows:—The plaintiff was the purchaser of a harp, sold by auction as an unredeemed pledge. The harp had been pledged by a person who had no title, and the real owner obliged the plaintiff to give it up, after it had been delivered to him by the defendant. Of the want of title in the pawnor, the defendant was ignorant. Under these circumstances, the Court was of opinion that there was no implied warranty of title—“that the vendor must be considered as selling merely the right to be pledge which he himself had.”

The judgment of the court is not confined to the application of the legal principles applicable to the facts before them. The rule is laid down, that generally no such implied warranty exists; but that it would be inferred from the usage of the trade, where the articles were purchased in a shop professedly carried on for the sale of goods. The judgment was principally founded on the rule of the old law—one, we think, ill adapted to the circumstances of the present generation, and which the enlightened spirit of modern law-givers has done much to dissolve.

When all sales took place in market overt—the then sole recognised place of sale—the common law annexed to that sale a complete title against all except the crown, and, subsequently, a prosecutor to whom restitution was ordered by the 11 Hen. 8, c. 11. This rule of the common law gave effectual protection to the vendee. The question we are now discussing could not arise except in sales in places not recognised as legitimate for the purposes of sale, and then the vendor gave no implied warranty, the vendee having notice of the infirmity in the place of the sale, was entitled to no redress, except for the deceit, if the vendor wilfully made a fraudulent representation of title; and this was the case of Sprigwell v. Allen (41. 91). There the defendant bought the horse in Smithfield, being a market overt; in the absence of any statement to the contrary, the inference was, that he believed himself possessed of a title as against the whole world; and, as the plaintiff could not have purchased in the market—else he also would have had good title, having purchased without notice of the infirmity in his vendor's title—he was bound to allege in the declaration that the defendant had sold the horse fraudulently, or knowing it not to be his own horse, which the plaintiff failed to prove. This is the oldest and the leading case on this branch of the law, and has been followed in all the subsequent cases.

The practice of selling in market overt all goods adapted for ordinary purposes, having almost wholly ceased, to follow fairly the analogy afforded by the former state of the law, the correct rule would appear to be, that the purchaser should, in every instance, have an implied warranty of title where the subject matter of sale is purchased in its known and customary place of sale, the place of resort for those requiring the thing to be purchased; viz., in a shop, as put by Mr. Baron Parke, for the sale of that particular class of goods. The indefeasible title given to the vendee amounted to an implied warranty; and, as the common law, when circumstances changed, did not follow up this rule, by giving an absolute title out of market overt, yet we think in lieu thereof its principles attached an implied warranty of title where the purchase was made in the place customarily used for such transactions; and, if not, then the vendee purchased on his own responsibility, and was remediless if his vendor's title was incomplete, unless he had an express warranty, or had averred and could prove fraud.

The judgment in the principal case appears to us to establish this proposition. Mr. Baron Parke, in his judgment (p. 285), after stating what appeared to him to be the general rule, “that there is no implied warranty of title on the sale of goods,” says, “the question on each case where there is no warranty in express terms, will be, whether there are such circumstances as to be an equivalent to such a warranty. Usage of trade, if proved, as a matter of fact, would, of course, be sufficient to raise an inference of such an engagement; and, without proof of such usage, the very nature of the trade may be enough to lead to the conclusion that the person carrying it on must be understood to engage that the purchaser shall enjoy that which he buys as against all persons; and we do not suppose there can be any doubt, that if articles are bought in a shop professedly carried on for the sale of goods, the shop-keeper must be considered as warranting that those who purchase will have a good title to keep the goods purchased.” These rules, or, rather, exceptions to the rule of non-warranty, appear to include every species of sale made in the place customarily used for that purpose.

The case of Burnet v. Rollitt, (11 Jur. 827,) illustrates this question. There, one person, having purchased a carcass of pork from a professed butcher, did not remove it immediately; another person, asking the butcher to sell the same meat, was referred to the first purchaser, who thereupon sold to the second. The meat proved to be unfit for use; and the Court held that no implied warranty of quality was created by this contract, the vendor not being a professed dealer. This, it will be observed, was a question of warranty of quality, not of title. But it shews the different view the law takes of a person professing a particular duty or business, and of a person acting otherwise than in their ordinary calling.

A contemporary legal journal (13 Eng. Jur. 141, part 2,) observing on this case, says:—"That so far as the judgment of the Court proceeded on the supposed analogy between warranty of title and of quality, the analogy is deficient, as, a shop-keeper does not warrant the quality of the goods sold by him, though he is now to be considered as warranting title." To these observations we cannot assent. To us the analogy appears extremely close, if not complete. No doubt, a shop-keeper does not, in every case, warrant the quality of goods sold by him, because they are capable of examination by the vendee; but so it is in the case of warranty of title; where it is in the power of the purchaser to ascertain, or the circumstances of the sale are such as to put him upon enquiry as to the state of the title, no implied warranty will arise, Bayley v. Meril, (Cro. Jac. 386;) Dyer v. Hargrave, (10 Ves. 507.) On the other hand, where the purchaser has no opportunity of examining the goods, merely ordering them from the shopkeeper, there is an implied warranty as to their fitness for the particular purpose they are required for, as in Burnet v. Rollitt, the Court holding that if the purchase had been from a professed dealer, and under the same circumstances which occurred with the defendant, in that case there would have been an implied warranty of the quality of the meat, at least its fitness for use, (See Browne v. Edginton, 2 M. & Gr. 279. Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 M. & W. 399; Jones v. Bright, 5 Bing. 583.) The conclusion arrived at by the same Journal,—that as no implied warranty of quality arose from the contract, when the purchaser has had full opportunity himself of examining the subject of the purchase, that consequently the maxim carere emptor was inapplicable to the case of warranty of title of goods, where the purchaser has not the means of exercising his own judgment, is, we think, deficient in analogy, if the rule we conceive deducible from the authorities be the true one, viz: that in cases of warranty, whether of title or quality, if the purchaser have the means of ascertaining the true state of facts, he takes on himself the responsibility, and no warranty is created.

If, on the contrary, the vendor has the sole means of knowledge, and the subject be purchased in the usual place of sale, under ordinary circumstances, and there is nothing in the sale such as would put a cautious purchaser on inquiry, a warranty of title will be implied.

The decision of the Court on the particular case before them, is in direct accordance with the view we have taken. The sale being notoriously of unredeemed pledges, the purchaser, in the view of the law, must have been aware that he could have no better title than his vendor had, which, necessarily was one qualified by the laws respecting pawnbrokers.

This decision, though not in terms, in principle establishes the rule followed in the civil law, as that of France and America,—viz., of implying warranty of title by the vendor of goods; the exceptions, to the general rule stated by Mr. Ben Parke, appearing to include almost every species of legitimate sale. To hold otherwise would leave every purchaser at the mercy of his vendor, and would cast a doubt on the bona fides of every contract, highly injurious to the interests of a commercial country.

55. That the parties complaining of or defending the election or return complained of in any election petition shall, except in the case herein-before provided for, by themselves or their agents, deliver in to the clerk of the general committee lists of the voters to be objected to, giving in the said lists the several heads of objection, and distinguishing the same against the names of the voters excepted to, not later than 6 o'clock on the 6th day next before the day appointed for choosing the committee to try the petition; and the said clerk shall keep the lists in his office open to the inspection of all parties.

56. That the general committee at the time and place appointed for choosing the committee, shall choose from the panel in service four members, not specially disqualified for being appointed on the committee to try such petition, by reason of having voted at the election, or by reason of being the party on whose behalf the seat is claimed, or related to him or to the sitting member by kindred or affinity in the first or second degree according to the canon law.

57. That if four members then present of the general committee of elections do not agree in choosing a committee to try any election petition the general committee shall adjourn the choosing of that committee, and of the remaining committees appointed to be chosen on the same day, to the following day, and the parties shall be directed to attend on the following day, or if such following day happen during an adjournment of the house, then on the day to which the house stands adjourned, and so from day to day until all such committees are chosen, or until the general committee of elections is dissolved, as herein-before provided; and the general committee shall not in any case proceed to choose a committee to try an election petition until they have chosen a committee to try every other election petition standing higher in the list aforesaid, the order for referring which has not been then discharged, except where the day originally appointed for choosing a committee has been changed under the provision herein-before contained.

58. That on the day appointed by the general committee to choose an election committee the members upon the chairmen's panel shall select one of such members to act as the chairman of such election committee, and when they have been informed by the general committee that four members of such election committee have been chosen they shall communicate the name of the member so selected by them to the general committee; but no member shall be so selected who would be disqualified from serving on such committee if not upon the chairmen's panel; provided always, that if, with reference to any petition for trying which they are about to appoint a chairman, the members of the chairmen's panel receive notice from the Speaker, under the provision herein-before contained, of the death or vacancy of the seat of the sitting member petitioned against in such petition, or that it is not his intention to defend his seat, they shall suspend their proceedings with regard to the appointment of a chairman to try such petition until the day appointed by the general committee of elections for selecting a committee to try such petition.

59. That the members upon the chairmen's panel may make such regulations as they find convenient for securing the appointment or selection of chairman of election committees, and for distributing the duties of chairmen among all of them.

60. That as soon as the general committee of elections has chosen four members to try any election petition, and has received from the members of the chairmen's panel the name of a chairman to serve, the parties in attendance shall be called in, and the names of the members so chosen and of the chairman shall be read to them.

61. That after hearing the said names the parties present shall be directed to withdraw, and the general committee may proceed to choose another committee to try the next petition appointed for that day, and so on until all the committees appointed to be chosen on that day are chosen, or until the choosing of any committee is adjourned as aforesaid; and after any such adjournment the general committee shall not transact any more business on that day, except with regard to those petitions for trying which committees have been previously chosen.

62. That within half an hour at furthest from the time when the parties to any election petition have withdrawn, or if the parties to any other election petition be then before the general committee of elections, then, after such other parties have withdrawn, the parties in attendance shall be again called before the general committee in the same order in which they were directed to withdraw; and the petitioners and sitting member, or such party as may have been admitted to defend the return or election, or their agents, beginning on the part of the petitioners, may object to all or any of the members chosen, or to the chairman, as being then disqualified or excused for any of the reasons aforesaid from serving on the committee for the trial of that election petition, but not for any other reason.

63. That if at the least four members then present of the general committee be satisfied that any member so objected to is then disqualified or excused for any of the reasons aforesaid, the parties present shall be again directed to withdraw, and the general committee shall proceed to choose from the same panel another committee to try that petition; or if the member to whom any such objection is substantiated be the chairman, they shall send back his name to the members on the chairmen's panel, and the members on the chairmen's panel shall proceed to choose another chairman to try that petition, and shall communicate his name to the general committee, and so as often as the case requires.

64. That in the second or any following committee the general committee may, if they think fit, include any of the members previously chosen by them to whom no objection has been substantiated; and no party shall be allowed to object to any member included in the second or any following committee who was not objected to when included in the committee first chosen.

65. That when four members and a chairman have been chosen, to none of whom any objection has been substantiated, the clerk of the general committee of elections shall give notice in writing to each of the members so chosen; and with every such notice shall be sent a notice of the grounds of disqualification and excuse from serving, and of the time and place when and where the general committee will meet on the following day; and notice of the time and place of such meeting shall be published with the votes.

66. That the general committee shall meet on the following day at the time and place mentioned; and if any such member then and there prove, to the satisfaction of at least four members then present of the general committee, that for any of the reasons aforesaid he is disqualified or excused from serving on the committee for which he has been so chosen, or if any such member prove, to the satisfaction of at least four members then present of the general committee, that there are any circumstances in his case which render him ineligible to serve on such select committee, such circumstances having regard solely to the impartial character of the tribunal, the general committee shall proceed to choose a new committee to try that petition, as if that member had been objected to by any party to the petition; and if within one quarter of an hour after the time mentioned in the notice no member so appear, or if any member so appearing do not prove his disqualification or excuse, to the satisfaction of at least four members then present of the general committee, the select committee shall be taken to be appointed.

67. That at the meeting of the House of Commons for the despatch of business next after any such select committee has been appointed the general committee of elections shall report to the house the names of the select committee appointed, and shall annex to such report all petitions referred to them by the house which relate to the return or election of which such select committee is appointed to try the merits, and all lists of voters which shall have been delivered to them by either party, and such report shall be published with the votes.

68. That at or before 4 o'clock on the next day on which the house meets for the despatch of business after such report the five members chosen to be the select committee shall attend in their places, and shall before departing the house be sworn at the table by the clerk well and truly to try the matter of the petitions referred to them, and a true judgment to give according to the evidence, and shall be taken to be a select committee legally appointed to try and determine the merits of the return or election so referred to them, and the legality of such appointment shall not be called in question on any ground whatever; and the member so appointed from the chairman's panel shall be the chairman of such committee; and they shall not depart the house until the time for the meeting of such committee is fixed by the house.

69. That if any member of the said select committee do not attend in his place within one hour after 4 o'clock on the day appointed for swearing the said committee (provided the house sits so long, or if not, then within the like time on the following day of sitting,) or if, after attending, any member depart the house before the said committee is sworn, unless the committee be discharged, or the swearing of the said committee be adjourned, he shall be ordered to be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms for such neglect of his duty, and shall be punished or censured, at the discretion of the house, unless it appear, by fact specially stated, and verified upon oath, that such member was by a sudden accident or by necessity prevented from attending.

70. That if any such absent member be not brought into the house within three hours after 4 o'clock on the day first appointed for swearing the said committee (provided the house sits so long, or if not, then within the like time on the following day of sitting,) and if no sufficient cause be shown whereon the house dispenses with the attendance of such absent member, the swearing of the committee shall be adjourned to the next meeting of the house; and all the members of the said committee shall be bound to attend in their places, for the purpose of being sworn, on the day of the next meeting of the house, in like manner as on the day first appointed for that purpose.

71. That if on the day to which the swearing of the said committee is so adjourned all the members of the committee do not attend, and be sworn, within one hour after 4 o'clock (provided the house sits so long, or if not, then within the like time of the following day of sitting,) or if on the day first appointed for swearing the said committee sufficient cause be shown to the house before its rising why the attendance of any member of the committee should be dispensed with, the said committee shall be taken to be discharged; and the general committee shall meet on the following day, or if such following day happen during an adjournment of the house, then on the day to which the house stands adjourned, and shall proceed to choose a new committee from the panel on service for the time being, in the manner hereinbefore provided, and notice of such meeting shall be published with the votes.

72. That the house shall refer the petitions and lists annexed to the report of the general committee of elections to the select committee so appointed and sworn, and shall order the said select committee to meet at a certain time, within 24 hours of their being sworn at the table of the house, unless a Sunday, Christmas day, or Good Friday, intervene; and the place of their meeting shall be some convenient room or place adjacent to the House of Commons.

73. That every such select committee shall meet at the time and place appointed for that purpose, and shall proceed to try the merits of the election petition so referred to them, and they shall sit from day to day, Sunday, Christmas day, and Good Friday only excepted, and shall never adjourn for a longer time than 24 hours, unless a Sunday, Christmas day, or Good Friday intervene, and in such case not more than 24 hours, exclusive of such Sunday, Christmas day, or Good Friday, without leave from the house, upon motion, and special cause assigned; and if the house be sitting at the time to which such select committee is adjourned, then the business of the house shall be stayed, and a motion shall be made for a further adjournment for any time to be fixed by the house: provided that if such select committee have occasion to apply or report to the house, and the house be then adjourned for more than 24 hours, such select committee may also adjourn to the day appointed for the meeting of the house.

74. That no evidence shall be given before the select committee, or before any commission issued by such committee, against the validity of any vote not included in one of the lists of voters delivered to the general committee, or upon any head of objection to any voter included in any such list other than one of the heads specified against him in such list.

75. That no member of any such select committee shall absent himself from the same without leave from the house, or an excuse allowed by the house at the next sitting thereof, for the cause of sickness, verified upon the oath of his medical attendant, or for other special cause shown upon oath, and in every such case the member to whom such leave is granted or excuse allowed shall be discharged from attending, and shall not be entitled again to sit or vote on such committee; and such select committee shall never sit until all the members to whom such leave has not been granted, nor excuse allowed, are met; and in case all such members do not meet within an hour after the time appointed for the first meeting of such committee, or within an hour after the time to which such committee has been adjourned, a further adjournment shall be made, and reported to the house by their chairman, with the cause thereof.

76. That every member whose absence without leave or excuse is so reported shall be directed to attend the house at its next sitting, and shall then be ordered to be taken into the custody of the serjeant at arms, and shall be punished or censured, at the discretion of the house, unless it appear, by facts stated, and verified upon oath, that such member was by a sudden accident or by necessity prevented from attending the said select committee.

77. That an election committee shall not be dissolved by reason of the death or necessary absence of one or two members thereof only, but the remaining members shall thereafter constitute the committee; and if there ever be occasion for electing a new chairman on the death or necessary absence of the chairman, the remaining members of the committee shall elect one of themselves to be chairman, and if in that election there be an equal number of votes the member whose name stands foremost in the list of the committee as reported to the house shall have a casting vote.

78. That if the number of members able to attend any such select committee be, by death or otherwise, reduced to less than three, and so continue for the space of three days, such select committee shall be dissolved (except in the case herein-after provided,) and another shall be appointed to try the petition referred to such committee; and the general committee and members of the chairman's panel shall meet for that purpose as soon as conveniently may be after the occasion arises, at a day and hour to be appointed by the general committee, and notice of such meeting shall be published with the votes; and all the proceedings of such former committee shall be void and of no effect; provided, that if all the parties before the committee consent, the two remaining members of the committee, or the sole remaining member if only one, shall continue to act, and shall thereafter constitute the committee.

79. That whenever any such select committee thinks it necessary to deliberate among themselves upon any question arising in the course of the trial, or upon the determination thereof, or upon any resolution concerning the matter of the petition referred to them, as soon as they have heard the evidence and counsel on both sides relative thereto, the room where they sit shall be cleared, if they think proper, whilst the members of the committee consider thereof.

80. That all questions before the committee, if for the time being consisting of more than one member, shall be decided by a majority of voices; and whenever the voices are equal the chairman shall have a casting voice; and no member of the committee shall be allowed to refrain from voting on any question on which the committee is divided.

81. That whenever the select committee is divided upon any question, the names of the members voting in the affirmative and in the negative shall be entered in the minutes of the said committee, and shall be reported to the house, with the questions on which such divisions arose, at the same time with the final report of the committee.

82. That every such committee shall be attended by a short-hand writer, appointed by the clerk of the House of Commons, and sworn by the chairman truly to take down the evidence, and from day to day, as occasion requires, to write or cause the same to be written in words at length.

83. That every such select committee may send for persons, papers, and records, and may examine any person who has subscribed the petition which such select committee are appointed to try, unless it otherwise appear to such committee that such person is an interested witness, and they shall examine all the witnesses who come before them upon oath, which oath the clerk attending such select committee may administer; and if any person summoned by such select committee, or by the warrant of the Speaker, (which warrants the Speaker may issue as he thinks fit,) disobey such summons, or if any witness before such select committee give false evidence or perjure, or otherwise misbehave in giving or refusing to give evidence, the chairman of such select committee, may at any time during the course of their proceedings report the same to the house for the interposition of the authority or censure of the house, and may, by a warrant under his hand directed to the serjeant at arms, or to his deputy or deputies, commit such person (not being a peer of the realm or lord of parliament) to the custody of the said serjeant, without bail or mainprize, for any time not exceeding 24 hours, if the house be then sitting, and if not, then for a time not exceeding 24 hours after the hour at which the house stands adjourned.

84. That where in this act anything is required to be verified on oath to the House of Commons, the clerk of the House of Commons may administer an oath for that purpose, or an affidavit for such purpose may be sworn before any justice of the peace or master of the high Court of Chancery.

85. That every person who wilfully gives false evidence before the House of Commons, or before any election committee, or before the examiner of recognisances or taxing officer of the House of Commons, under the provisions of this act, or who wilfully swears falsely in any affidavit shall, on conviction thereof, be liable to the penalties of wilful and corrupt perjury.

86. That every such select committee shall try the merits of the return or election complained of in the election petition referred to them, and shall determine by a majority of voices, whether the sitting members or either of them, or any and what other person, were duly returned or elected, or whether the election be void, or whether a new writ ought to issue, which determination shall be final between the parties; and the house, on being informed thereof, shall order such report to be entered in their journals, and shall give directions for confirming or altering the return, or for ordering a return to be made, or for issuing a writ for a new election, or for carrying the said determination into execution.

87. That if any such select committee come to any resolution other than the determination above mentioned, they shall, if they think proper, report the same to the house, and the house may confirm or disagree with such resolution, and make such orders thereon as to them seems proper.

88. That if the parliament be prorogued after the appointment of any select committee for the trial of any election petition, and before they have reported their determination thereon, such committee shall not be dissolved by such prorogation, but shall be thereby adjourned till 12 o'clock on the day immediately following that on which parliament meets again for the despatch of business (Sunday, Good Friday, and Christmas day, always excepted;) and all proceedings of such committee and of any commission to take evidence issued under the authority of such committee shall be of the same force and effect as if parliament had not been so prorogued; and such committee shall meet on the day and hour to which it is so adjourned, and shall thenceforward continue to sit from day to day, until they have reported to the house their determination on the merits of such petition.

89. That whenever any committee appointed to try an election petition reports to the house that such petition was frivolous or vexatious, the parties, (if any,) who have appeared before the committee in opposition to such petition, shall be entitled to recover from the persons, or any of them who signed such petition, the full costs and expenses which such parties have incurred in opposing the same, such costs and expenses to be ascertained in the manner herein-after directed.

90. That whenever such committee reports to the house that the opposition made to any such petition by any party appearing before them was frivolous or vexatious, the persons who signed such petition shall be entitled to recover from the party with respect to whom such report is made the full costs and expenses which such petitioners have incurred, such costs and expenses to be ascertained in the manner herein-after directed.

91. That whenever no party has appeared before any such committee in opposition to such petition, and such committee reports to the house that the election or return, on the omission or insufficiency of a return complained of in such petition, was vexatious or corrupt, the persons who signed such petition shall be entitled to recover from the sitting members (if any) whose election or return is complained of in such petition (such sitting members not having given notice of their intention not to defend the same,) or from any other persons admitted by the house to oppose such petition, the full costs and expenses incurred in prosecuting the petition, such costs and expenses to be ascertained in the manner herein-after directed.

92. That if any ground of objection be stated against any voter in any list of voters intended to be objected to, and if such select committee be of opinion that such objection was frivolous or vexatious, they shall report the same to the House of Commons, together with the other matters relating to the said petition, and the opposite party shall in such case be entitled to recover from the party on whose behalf any such objections were made the full costs and expenses incurred by reason of such frivolous or vexatious objections, such costs and expenses to be ascertained in the manner herein-after directed.

93. That if either party make before the said select committee any specific allegation with regard to the conduct of the other party or his agent, and either bring no evidence, or such evidence that the committee is of opinion that such allegation was made without any reasonable or probable ground, the committee may make such orders for the payment, by the party making such unfounded allegation, to the other party, of all costs and expenses incurred by reason of such unfounded allegation, such costs and expenses to be ascertained in the manner herein-after directed.

94. That the costs and expenses adjudged by any such select committee to be paid, or which otherwise may become payable, under the provisions of this act or the said recited act of the 8th Vic., to any party prosecuting or opposing or preparing to oppose any election petition, or to any witness summoned to attend before any committee, under the provisions of this or the said recited act, shall be ascertained in manner following; (that is to say,) on application made to the Speaker of the House of Commons by any petitioner, party, or witness, for ascertaining such costs and expenses, not later than three calendar months after the determination of the merits of such petition, or after any order of the house for discharging the order of reference of such petition, to the general committee of elections, or after the withdrawal of any petition as herein-before provided, the Speaker shall direct the same to be taxed by the examiner of recognisances or by the taxing officer of the House of Commons; and the said examiner or taxing officer shall examine and tax such costs and expenses, and shall report the amount thereof, together with the name of the party liable to pay the same, and the name of the party entitled to receive the same, to the Speaker, who shall, upon application made to him, deliver to the party a certificate, signed by himself, expressing the amount of the costs and expenses allowed in such report, with the name of the party liable to pay the same, and the name of the party entitled to receive the same; and such certificate so signed by the Speaker shall be conclusive evidence for all purposes whatever as well of the amount of the demand as of the title of the party therein named to recover the same from the party therein stated to be liable to the payment thereof; and the party claiming under the same shall, upon payment thereof, give a receipt at the foot of such certificate, which shall be a sufficient discharge for the same.

95. That the examiner of recognisances or the said taxing officer may examine upon oath any party claiming any such costs or expenses, and any witnesses tendered to him for examination, and may receive affidavits sworn before him, or before any master of the high Court of Chancery, or any Justice of the peace, relative to such costs or expenses.

96. That the party entitled to such taxed costs and expenses, or his or her executors or administrators, may demand the whole amount, so certified, from any one or more of the persons liable to the payment thereof, and in case of nonpayment thereof, on demand, may recover the same by action of debt in any of Her Majesty's courts of record at Westminster or Dublin or in the court of session in Scotland, in which action it shall be sufficient for the plaintiff to declare that the defendant is indebted to him in the sum mentioned in the said certificate; and the said plaintiff shall, upon filing the said declaration, together with the said certificate and an affidavit of such demand, be at liberty to sign judgment as for want of plea by nil dicit, and take out execution for the said sum so mentioned in the said certificate, together with the costs of the said action, according to due course of law; provided that the validity of such certificate (the handwriting of the Speaker thereunto being duly verified) shall not be called in question in any court.

97. That in every case any person from whom the amount of such costs and expenses have been so recovered may recover in like manner from the other persons, or any of them (if such there be) who are liable to the payment of the same costs and expenses, a proportionate share thereof, according to the extent of the liability of each person.

98. That if any person having subscribed an election petition presented under this act, or under the said recited act of the 8th Vict., neglect or refuse, for the space of seven days after demand, to pay to any witness summoned on his behalf before any committee under the provisions of this or the said act the sum so certified by the Speaker, under the authority of this or the said act, to be due to such witness, or if such petitioner neglect or refuse, for the space of six months after demand, to pay to any party opposing the said petition the sum so certified by the Speaker to be due to such party for his costs and expenses, and if such neglect or refusal be, within one year after the granting of such certificate, proved to the Speaker's satisfaction, by affidavit sworn before any master of the high Court of Chancery (and such master is hereby authorized to administer such oath, and is authorized and required to certify such affidavit under his hand,) in every such case every person who has entered into a recognisance relating to such petition under the provisions of this or the said recited act shall be held to have made default in his said recognisance, and the Speaker of the House of Commons shall thereupon certify such recognisance into the Court of Exchequer in England if the person who entered into such recognisance reside in England, or into the Court of Exchequer in Ireland if such person reside in Ireland, or into the Court of Exchequer in Scotland if such person reside in Scotland, and shall also certify that such person has made default therein, and such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the validity of such recognisance and of such default; and the recognisance, being so certified, if the person who entered into such recognisance reside in England, shall be delivered by the clerk or one of the clerks assistant of the House of Commons into the hands of the Lord Chief Baron or one of the barons of the Court of Exchequer in England, or of some officer appointed by the court to receive the same, or if such person reside in Ireland or Scotland shall be transmitted through the post, in manner herein-after mentioned, to the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, or to one of the judges of the court of session discharging for the time the powers and duties of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, as the case may require, and in every such case such delivery or transmission of such recognisance shall have the same effect as if the same were extracted from a court of law, and the validity of such certificate (the handwriting of the Speaker thereunto being duly verified) shall not be called in question in the said court.

DUBLIN, MAY 5, 1849.

On Thursday, the 26th of April, Lord John Russell introduced his plan for an amended Poor Law. On the same night, the Solicitor-general for England an amended Encumbered Estates bill, also a bill for conversion of leases for lives renewable for ever into fee-farm; and intimated that it was the intention of government next session to introduce a measure with respect to judgments—the effect of which will be, we apprehend, to repeal portions of the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, and make judgments no longer a charge upon land. He hinted also that it was in contemplation to improve the system of registration in this country.

Important measures all. Last year we were so inured to revolutions in the political world, that there is now no amount of legal revolution that we cannot contemplate with fortitude, if not with calmness. And are we not tried? We are threatened with the extinction of three-fourths of the business of the Court of Chancery, and with it the annihilation of our own.

We do not, however, acquiesce in these gloomy anticipations. Moments of depression may arrive in the legal as in the mercantile world; but, if our profession be necessary and useful to the public, we shall survive these periods of distress.

At the moment we write, when the hands of the Court of Chancery are full, we believe there never was a time when the scale of remuneration was less. The terms on which our leading men do business here, would amaze our brethren in London; and with the return of prosperity, oh quando dies veniet, will return a different class of business. It is a mistake to suppose that the distress of the country is beneficial to lawyers, and equally a mistake that the Courts of Equity will fall into disuse if the country prosper;—it is, in point of fact, then that they come into most active and beneficial operation.

But however much or little the interests of the legal professions may be concerned, the consideration of them is utterly unimportant, when compared with the effect that may be produced upon the country.

With the experience of the Incumbered Estates Act of last session before our eyes—our predictions of its failure now admitted on all hands—we may be excused for pausing before we come to a conclusion as to the likelihood of the new measure having a very extended operation.

It was judicious in the extreme of the Premier to let it follow as a supplementary statement of the poor law; for except the dread of indefinite poor law pressure be removed, there will be no purchasers. The certainty of the rate never exceeding a certain limit—if there were no rate in aid, a subject still left in the dark—will give to the new measure a chance of success, which its cumbrous predecessor had not, and a good harvest would give it a greater one. It will be conceded, that for the operations of barter, buyers are essential, and they have been much more wanted than legislation. We do not depreciate the effect of the latter, but the former is indispensable; and however sound legislation may invite the buyer, his zest for the bargain will be contingent on the quality of the article for sale. We anticipate more benefit from a sound system of poor laws, than from a temporary Commission. When we take away the glare and glitter of novelty, we shall find this Government Commission will be little more than the Court of Chancery, going, if it goes at all, a little quicker. The chief utility which we anticipate, as its lasting result, will be that it will be found it is possible to abridge the time now consumed by solicitors, and a precedent for celerity may be established. We earnestly hope that safety may not be sacrificed to speed.

The chief proposed excellence of the bill is the gift of a parliamentary title. We know that to the public generally, and, no doubt justly, an infeasible title on a skin of parchment presents a powerful inducement to purchase, and the present position of a portion of the country does justify strong measures to unsettle property, and by the aid of a new tribunal, to free land from its load of incumbrances. We do not object to the principle, but we conceive the legislature imposes upon the proposed Commissioners a task of greater difficulty than is generally imagined, if they seek to do this effectually and justly. As we understand the statement of the Solicitor-general, he proposes not merely to sell the lands, but at once to distribute the purchase-money. For this object the Commissioners will have the power to make and vary rules. On those rules hinge the fate of the measure; on them it stands or falls. The legislature shifts the whole difficulty on a tribunal the offspring of to-day, to die to-morrow, with no further appeal than to the judicial committee of the privy council.

The rules will just be tested, when the period of their dissolution has arrived; either the Commission will merge into the Court of Chancery, or the Court of Chancery into the Commission.

The fact is this; after the statement of Sir Robert Peel, ministers found they could rest no longer on the laissez-faire system, and they bring in a bill with a disingenuous disavowal of its real originator, and a flimsy story of its having been suggested by the idea of a West India Commission. It has not the merit of originality, nor has it the boldness of Sir Robert Peel's plan. It leaves its use to choice, and we question much whether it will not be disused. If Sir Robert's idea had been carried out, there was a power of doing a great national benefit. The Government took possession of a province bought with Government money, and distributed it as they thought best. The present Bill falls short; it leaves to the choice of owner and incumbrancer the resort to the new measure, and establishes a new, untried tribunal, necessarily more arbitrary than the Court of Chancery, for the adjudication of questions of property, priority, and legal rights.

And this court is vested with the most unconstitutional power—that of determining the right of appeal to the judicial committee. In other words a tribunal is appointed not only to try, but to determine whether the trial is to be absolutely conclusive and irreversible. Except the force of public opinion can be brought to bear on the Commissioners, the veto thus given them is the most arbitrary conceivable. A most wholesome check given by our happy constitution was a right of appeal ex debito iuritis; that right kept judges in awe, gave security to the suitor, and we regret exceedingly to observe any precedent for its abridgement.

Such extensive prospects were held out by the first act for the sale of Incumbered Estates, that, taught by the experience of its failure, our readers will think it but wise, if we caution them against forming exaggerated ideas of the present. Its success will depend on so many causes—the character and capacity of the Commissioners—their orders—the confidence that their proceedings will inspire—the enactment of an improved poor law—the cessation of the potato disease—the inducements held out to capitalists—the forbearance or harshness of creditors—the desire of the owner to part or to retain—and the innumerable extrinsic causes which legislation cannot provide for, and yet which sway the land market.

Legislation of this extraordinary character presupposes the bankruptcy of the property to be sold; and, if such be the fact—as it unquestionably is in many instances—it is well worthy of consideration, whether all creditors should not, in this land bankruptcy, be levelled, as they are in cases of traders; or, as a nearer approximation to justice, that the prior incumbrancer should suffer an ad valorem abatement calculated by the value of the land when the investment was made, and its value when sold.

When the inheritor dealt with the incumbrancer, he had, in many instances, a sufficient, if not a superabundant security; the combined effects of famine and legislation have reduced one-half the value of his lands. Is it equitable that all this loss should fall on the paise, and none on the prior creditor? Nay, further, is it just that it should all fall on the inheritor? Most certainly, debt has drawn on him a heavy punishment; severely does he suffer for his own sins, or, what is much more likely, for the sins of his forefathers. By recent legislation, a blow is struck at the fixity of property. "Ancient nobility is an honourable thing, which hath stood the waves and the weathers of time." The feudal principle had grown up as a sentiment which had long obtained, and was long cherished. The tendency of legislation since Peter Thelluson's time, has been to offer facilities to unsettle, and the design is now "to give currency to land."

We do not deprecate the attempt; we think it necessary that incumbered properties should be emancipated; but we wish to guard against an emancipation which is regardless of all vested rights, and all settled principles.

We cannot close this article without adverting to the fact, that all legislative activity for Ireland is entrusted in the House of Commons, to English lawyers. Time was, when Irish lawyers introduced measures affecting the laws of Ireland. Time was, when the British senate was adorned by the eloquence and the learning of members of the Irish Bar—time was, when every Irish government insisted on, at least, one law officer of the Crown being a member of the House of Commons; but now, now avons changés tout cela, though never since the Union was there a greater necessity for Irish legislators. The Solicitor General for England introduces, and ably introduces, we admit, a measure deeply affecting the real property of Ireland; the English Attorney General defends the Irish Attorney General, for his system of retrenchment in crown prosecutions, a system by which briefs were put into the hands of counsel when the prisoner was arraigned, and when, without time for preparation, they were expected to prosecute.

We care not of what party he may be, but we are satisfied there is no Irish lawyer, with a spark of professional feeling, who does not feel it a discredit and a disgrace that we have no legal representative on the ministerial side of the House, in times and crises such as these.

A PLAN for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland has at length been proposed, on the responsibility of her Majesty's Government. The Poor-law of 1837, so tenaciously clung to despite of the remonstrances of every one having any knowledge of Irish affairs, has at length been acknowledged as unequal to the difficulties of the present crisis. The Prime Minister, having in vain sought for advice from a convention of the Irish Members, has plagiarised some confiscatory ideas from the plan of Sir Robert Peel, and, mingling these with notions of his own, has produced a measure which contemplates the advantage of getting rid of incumbered proprietors, without the least regard to the terms on which they may be deprived of their estates, or to the extent to which their sale may satisfy the claims of incumbrancers.

That a nominal landlord, who is unable to perform the duties which properly attach to the owners of land, should be compellable to give place to others who can perform those duties, is a principle which we have always advocated; but, that a landlord should be compelled to part with his estate, at the depreciated value to which the mismanagement of the Government of the country for the last three years has reduced it, we consider in the utmost degree inequitable. Many proprietors, who have done the utmost that could be done, to alleviate the condition of their tenantry, and to raise the value of their estates, will, by this enactment, be literally beggared; and incumbrancers, who lent their money but a few years since on unquestionable security, will, in many cases, find that the proceeds of the sale will not reach their claims, and because the Government would persist in applying to a pauperized country a principle which might profitably be applied to a rich and prosperous one.

We can understand that a rich proprietary might be induced or compelled to provide profitable employment for able-bodied paupers, by being taxed for their support; but we cannot understand, how the taxation of pauper proprietors could lead to any such beneficial result. That the Government should not undertake the employment of a pauper population, but, should use means to induce or compel owners of land to employ them, as a general principle, we admit; but we assert, that general rules should not be applied in cases where there is no possibility of their success—supporting a population in idleness, at the expense of a ruined proprietary, to compel them to employ that population—is one of these cases. That this principle is at length deserted, is apparent from the introduction of a maximum with regard to the rate, on separate divisions and unions—one of the most important alterations proposed in the present bill. When a Government deserts a principle, it should not be forgotten that some consideration is due to those interests which have been injured—nay, in some instances, destroyed—by the adoption of and perseverance in it.

Late, as the proposition of a maximum has come, we hail it as an alteration of great importance and value, not so much, however, to the interests of the present proprietors, as the distressed unions (who will find 7s. 6d. in the £1, in many instances a tax beyond their ability to pay) as to the interests of incoming proprietors or farmers. These men will make their purchases, or adjust their rents with a full knowledge of the amount of taxation to which they will be liable; and in these instances, as far as they are concerned, it will be as if there were no poor rate whatever—they will either allow for the poor rate in the purchase-money, or in the rent; so that in either case the whole weight will fall on the present proprietor. However, this limitation may (and does seem calculated to) have the effect of inducing capitalists to speculate in land—and this, even on such terms, it is of great importance to encourage.

We do not know on what principle to account for the next proposition of the Premier, namely, that the Poor Law Commissioners shall have the power to settle the past liabilities of certain electoral divisions. If the poor rate be a primary charge on property, and if a judgment can be obtained to enforce the payment of it, we do not see why, in every instance, the proprietor should not be made to pay; nor do we see why, with justice, arrears should be remitted to one proprietor, when another proprietor has been held liable. The latter proprietor might, with as much justice, demand that his money should be refunded to him, as the former expect that his arrears should be remitted; besides, this provision rewards the non-paying proprietor, and would no doubt encourage a similar course of conduct. With regard to persons who are not owners, the same reasoning applies; their interests are worth something, and if the poor rate can be collected in no other way, these interests should be sold. A tenant will scarcely be allowed to hold a farm without paying rent, and if he can pay rent, his non-payment of the poor rate should be no reason for striking off the arrear. Waste, untenanted lands are not in a very different position; they too are worth something—at least worth the amount of poor rate due on them; and when it is remembered that each "settlement of past liabilities" increases the rate to which the property of the industrious farmer or owner will be liable, it is clearly only justice to this useful class, that property, whether in the occupation of owners, of farmers, or waste, should be held liable for rates which other property in the division or union, has been compelled to pay.

The avowed object of the confiscatory part of this bill, is, that by the introduction of men with capital and enterprise in the room of the present proprietors, employment may be afforded to the able-bodied poor, who may thus be enabled to earn their own subsistence. The same object, avowedly, is aimed at by the reduction in size of electoral divisions and unions, thus rendering it possible that the exertions of a few improving proprietors should sensibly affect the amount of poor-rate. We find some difficulty in reconciling these avowals with the statement of the Premier, "that it would not be useful to make a farther division of unions, unless, at the same time, some provision were made for new work-houses." If the Premier has any confidence in his own plan, he should contemplate such a reduction in the present extent of pauperism as would render the present work-house accommodation amply sufficient. From what we have seen, heard, and read on the subject of work-houses, we consider them most objectionable institutions—destructive to the morality and self-dependence of their inmates—confining large masses of poor, only to expose them to the ravages of fever or cholera. Far from wishing for the multiplication of work-houses—we would very sincerely rejoice in the diminution of their number. Lord John, however, seems to contemplate the permanent establishment of pauperism, and recommends the diminution of the size of unions rather, as affording facilities for a more convenient distribution of the paupers, by increasing the number of poor-houses, than as supplying anything in the way of stimulus to the exertions of proprietors.

We accept that part of the bill which proposes to render jointures and rent-charges by way of life annuities, liable for poor-rate, as a promise of a change in the principle of taxation. We cannot assent to the proposition, that any person, in consequence of possessing a peculiar species of property, should be allowed to plead an exemption from contribution for the support of the poor.

LEASEHOLD TENURE OF LANDS (IRELAND.)

A BILL INTITULED AN ACT FOR CONVERTING THE RENEWABLE LEASEHOLD TENURE OF LANDS IN IRELAND INTO A TENURE IN FEE.

Whereas many lands in Ireland are held under leases and under-leases respectively, with covenants for perpetual renewal, and great expense is constantly incurred in procuring renewals under such covenants, and much litigation and inconvenience arise from such tenures; and it is expedient that such tenures should be converted, in manner herein-after provided, into tenures and fee, and that, except as herein excepted, all leases and under-leases of lands in Ireland, with covenants for perpetual renewal, granted or made after the passing of this act, should operate and take effect in manner herein-after mentioned: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that where lands in Ireland are held under any lease in perpetuity, the owner of such lease in perpetuity, at any time after the passing of this act, and whether the time for renewal has or has not arrived, may require the owner of the reversion to execute a grant, according to the provisions of this act, of the lands comprised in such lease; and the owner of the reversion, upon being so required as aforesaid, shall execute a grant to the owner of such lease of an estate of inheritance in fee simple in such lands, subject to a perpetual yearly fee-farm rent, of such amount as herein-after mentioned, to be charged upon such lands, and to be payable on the same days and times as the yearly rent made payable by such lease, and subject to the like covenants and conditions for securing the payment of such fee-farm rent as are contained in such lease, with respect to the rent thereby reserved, and with and subject to such other covenants, conditions, exceptions and reservations (save covenants to grant or to accept and take a renewal of such lease and such covenants, conditions, exceptions, and reservations as may be commuted as herein-after mentioned) as are contained in such lease, and then subsisting; and where lands in Ireland are held under any under-lease in perpetuity of any degree of tenure, the owner of such under-lease, at any time after the passing of this act, and whether the time for renewal has or has not arrived, may require the owner of the lease or under-lease in perpetuity out of which such first-mentioned under-lease is derived, or the owner of the estate of inheritance which may have been granted in respect of the lease or under-lease, out of which such first-mentioned under-lease is derived, to execute a grant according to the provisions of this act, of the lands comprised in such first-mentioned under-lease, and the owner so required, shall thereupon execute a grant to the owner of such under-lease of an estate of inheritance in fee simple in such lands, subject to a perpetual yearly fee-farm rent, of such amount as herein-after mentioned, to be charged upon such lands, and to be payable on the same days and times as the yearly rent made payable by such under-lease, and subject to the like covenants and conditions for securing such fee-farm rent, as are contained in such under-lease with respect to the rent thereby reserved, and subject to such other covenants, conditions, exceptions, and reservations (save covenants to grant, or to accept and take a renewal of such lease, and such covenants, conditions, exceptions and reservations, as may be commuted as herein-after mentioned) as are contained in such under-lease, and then subsisting; and upon the delivery of every such grant as aforesaid, to the owner requiring the same, he shall execute and deliver to the owner executing such grant, a counterpart thereof; and every such grant and counterpart shall be prepared by the owner by whom the grant is made, and the expense of the preparation and execution of such grant and counterpart shall be paid by the owner to whom the grant is made: provided always, that the owner required to make any such grant as aforesaid, shall not be obliged to execute such grant until, when the time for renewal of the lease or under-lease by the owner of which the grant is required has not arrived, all such arrears or sums, if any, of or in respect of rent as, if the time had arrived for renewal of such lease or under-lease, and a bill had been filed for the renewal thereof, would have been required by a Court of Equity to be paid on such renewal, and where the time for renewal of such lease or under-lease has arrived, or where there has not been a renewal of such lease or under-lease at or after the time at which the same might have been last renewed according to the covenant for renewal, all such arrears or sums, if any, of or in respect of rent, and, also, all such fines and fees, if any, and interest as would have been required by a Court of Equity to be paid on renewal of such lease or under-lease, are paid; provided also, that no owner required to execute any such grant as aforesaid shall be obliged to execute such grant where the right of renewal is lost both at law and in equity ; and where any owner required to execute any such grant as aforesaid, disputes the right of the party requiring such grant, to require the execution of such grant, such owner shall, within one calendar month after he is so required as aforesaid, serve on the person by whom such grant has been required, a notice in writing, stating that the right to require such grant is disputed, and the grounds on which such right is so disputed.

II. And be it enacted, that the fee-farm rent to be made payable by every such grant as aforesaid, shall, when the lease or under-lease (as the case may be) to the owner of which the grant is made renewable without fine, or upon payment of a peppercorn or other merely nominal fine of like nature, be of the like amount as the yearly rent made payable by such lease or under-lease, and shall, where such lease or under-lease is renewable upon payment of a fine or fines not merely nominal, be of and amount equal to the aggregate amount of the yearly rent made payable by such lease or under-lease, and the value of the renewal fine or fines and fees (if any), such value to be estimated or computed with regard to the probable duration of the subsisting term, the average duration of life, and the respective periods for renewal, but without regard to, and exclusively of any penal rents or sums made payable upon neglect, delay, or refusal to apply for or take renewal, and to be ascertained as herein-after mentioned, if the parties differ about the same.

III. And be it enacted, that where any subsisting exception or reservation contained in the lease or under-lease in perpetuity, by the owner of which a grant is required as aforesaid, or any right under covenant, or otherwise annexed or belonging to the reversion or estate, from the owner of which a grant is required, interferes with the proper cultivation of the lands comprised in such lease or under-lease, the owner of such lease or under-lease requiring such grant as aforesaid may (if he think fit) require that such exception, reservation, or right should cease, wholly or partially, and in such case the grant shall be modified accordingly, and the fee-farm rent to be made payable by such grant shall be increased by such an amount as is equivalent to the value of such exception, reservation, or right, in so far as it is made to cease as aforesaid, such amount to be ascertained in manner herein-after mentioned, in case the parties differ about the same.

IV. Provided always, and be it enacted, that where any right to timber, timber trees, woods, underwood, or underground woods, turbaries, mines, minerals, quarries, or royalties, whether under express exception or reservation contained in the lease or under-lease in perpetuity or otherwise, is annexed to or belongs to the reversion or estate from the owner of which a grant is required, it shall not be lawful for the owner of the lease or under-lease in perpetuity requiring the grant to require that such right should cease, either wholly or partially, but in every such case the owner of the reversion or estate from the owner of which the grant is required and the owner of the lease or under-lease requiring the grant may agree that such right should cease or pass under the grant, either wholly or partially, and in such case the grant shall be modified accordingly, and the yearly fee-farm rent to be made payable by such grant shall be increased by such an amount as is equivalent to the value of such right, so far as it is made to cease or pass as aforesaid.

V. And be it enacted, that, where the owner required to execute such grant as aforesaid, and the owner requiring the same shall so agree, a part of the lands comprised in the lease or under-lease by the owner of which such grant is required, and not comprised in any inferior under-lease in perpetuity, may be allocated in fee simple in lieu of the fee-farm rent which would have been made payable by such grant or of any portion thereof, or such fee-farm rent, or any portion thereof, in lieu of which land is not allocated as aforesaid, may be made payable out of any sufficient part only, to be specified in the grant, of the lands comprised in such lease or under-lease, and the residue of the lands shall be discharged therefrom ; and where land is allocated as aforesaid, the same shall, by the same grant, be conveyed or surrendered by the owner of the lease or under-lease to the owner to whom the fee-farm rent in lieu of which or of a portion of which the same is allocated would have been payable.

VI. And be it enacted, that from and after the execution of such grant to the owner of a lease in perpetuity, or to the owner of an under-lease in perpetuity, as aforesaid, such grant shall, where such grant is made to the owner of a lease in perpetuity, bind all persons interested in the reversion and in such lease, and all persons bound by such lease, and such reversion shall be converted into an estate of inheritance in fee simple in the fee-farm rent made payable by such grant, and the conditions, exceptions, and reservations therein contained, and all rights annexed or belonging to such reversion, saved by and not commuted under this act ; and such grant shall, where such grant is made to the owner of an under-lease in perpetuity, bind all persons interested in the lease or superior under-lease, or the estate of inheritance granted in respect thereof by the owner of which the grant is made, and in the under-lease to the owner of which the grant is made, all persons bound by such under-lease ; and the estate held under such lease or superior under-lease, or such estate of inheritance as aforesaid, shall be converted into an estate of inheritance in fee simple in the fee-farm rent made payable by such grant, and the conditions, exceptions, and reservations therein contained, and all rights annexed or belonging to the estate by the owner of which such grant is made, saved by and not commuted under this act ; and each such estate of inheritance in fee simple as aforesaid shall be transmissible and descendible in like manner as if the same were an estate of inheritance in fee simple in reversion in the lands, on which the fee-farm rent is charged by the grant creating the same, having incident thereto the conditions, exceptions and reservations contained in the same grant, and such rights respectively as aforesaid ; and the estate of inheritance created under every such grant as aforesaid in the lands comprised therein, save any part thereof allocated in lieu of a fee-farm rent or any portion thereof under the provision herein contained, and the estate of inheritance so created as aforesaid in the fee-farm rent made payable by such grant, and in any land so allocated as aforesaid, shall from and after the execution of such grant be respectively vested in the same persons, for the same estates and interests, and be respectively subject to the same uses, trusts, provisos, agreements, and declarations, and be respectively charged with and subject to the same charges, liens, judgments, incumbrances, and equities, as the estate held under the lease or under-lease in perpetuity to the owner of which the grant is made, and the reversion or estate by the owner of which the grant is made, were respectively vested in, subject to, and charged with immediately before their conversion into such respective estates of inheritance as aforesaid was effected, or as near thereto as the different nature of the estates and the circumstances of each case will admit; but all land allocated as aforesaid shall remain subject to all demises and tenancies inferior in tenure to the lease or under-lease by the owner of which such land may have been so allocated.

VII. And be it enacted, that the conversion of any estate under this act shall not prevent or prejudice the operation of any devise, bequest, or testamentary appointment, made before such conversion of such estate, or any interest therein, but such devise, bequest, or testamentary appointment shall operate upon the estate or interest created or acquired under this act, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes whatever, as the same would have operated upon the respective estate or interest previously subsisting if no such conversion had taken place.

VIII. And be it enacted, that no conversion under this act of any estate shall operate to give dower or curtesy to the widow or husband of any person becoming entitled under this act to an estate of inheritance, in any case where the estate converted would not have been liable to dower or curtesy, and such widow or husband was married to such person before such conversion, or to defeat or affect any rights of lords of manors, or of owners of reversions in fee simple, to escheats, fairs, markets, franchises, rights, liberties, privileges of chase or free warren, hunting, hawking, fowling, piscaries, fisheries and rights of fishing, or any rights in any mines or minerals, quarries, or royalties within or under the lands included in any estate converted under this act, save in so far as the same may be commuted under this act.

IX. And be it enacted, that all covenants by law implied on the part of the landlord or tenant upon any lease or under-lease in perpetuity to the owner of which a grant is made under this act shall be implied upon such grant, and every covenant for payment of rent, and every other covenant contained in pursuance of this act in any such grant aforesaid, in substitution for a like covenant in the lease or under-lease to the owner of which such grant is made, where such last mentioned covenant is of such a nature as that the burden thereof doth by law run with the land, and bind the assignee of such lease or under-lease, and every covenant implied under this act upon any such grant where the burden of the implied covenant for which the same is in substitution was upon the owner of such lease or under-lease, shall run with the estate in fee simple into which the estate held under such lease or under-lease is converted under this act, and the owner or assignee for the time being of such estate in fee simple shall be chargeable upon such covenants in the same manner and to the same extent as if he were owner or assignee of the term or interest created by such lease or under-lease, and such term or interest, and the estate out of which such lease or under-lease was derived, were still subsisting, and the benefit of such covenants shall run with the estate into which such estate is converted under this act, and the owner or assignee for the time being of the estate created by such conversion shall have the full benefit of such covenants, and be entitled to maintain actions thereon; and every covenant contained in pursuance of this act in any such grant as aforesaid, in substitution for a like covenant in such lease or under-lease as aforesaid, where such last mentioned covenant is of such a nature as that the burden thereof doth by law run with the estate out of which such lease or under-lease was derived, or bind the assignee of such estate, and every covenant implied under this act upon any such grant where the burden of the implied covenant, for which the same is in substitution was upon the owner of the estate out of which such lease or under-lease was derived, shall run with the estate into which such estate is converted under this act; and the owner or assignee for the time being of the estate created by such conversion shall be chargeable upon such covenants in the same manner and to the same extent as if he were owner or assignee of such estate so converted, and such estate and lease or under-lease were still subsisting, and the benefit of such covenants shall run with the estate in fee simple into which the estate held under such lease or under-lease is converted under this act, and the owner or assignee for the time being of such estate in fee simple shall have the full benefit of such covenants, and be entitled to maintain actions thereon.

X. And be it enacted, that where the estate held under any lease or under-lease in perpetuity is converted under this act into an estate of inheritance in fee simple, and such estate was immediately before such conversion subject to any subsisting under-lease or demise at will, or for any greater interest, the fee simple into which such estate is so converted shall be the reversion immediately expectant upon such under-lease or demise, and the rents and services reserved and made payable upon such under-lease or demise shall be incident and annexed to such reversion, and the covenants and agreements, whether express or implied, on the part both of the landlord and the tenant, shall run with the land and with the reversion respectively in the same manner in all respects and to the same extent as if such under-lease or demise had been made by a person seized in fee simple in possession, and the estate in fee simple created by such conversion as aforesaid had been the reversion expectant upon such under-lease or demise; and such conversion shall not prejudice or affect any right of distress, entry, or action which has accrued in respect of such under-lease or demise before such conversion.

XI. Provided always, and be it enacted, that no grant made by the owner of any lease or under-lease in perpetuity under this act shall prejudice or affect the rights of the owner of the reversion, or of any lease or under-lease superior in tenure, or of the estates into which they may be respectively converted under this act, but all owners, under-lessees, and occupiers for the time being of any land shall have the like rights and equities to be discharged of and indemnified against fee-farm rents created under this act as such owners and occupiers respectively would have had in respect of the rents incident to the several reversions or estates converted into such respective fee-farm rents; and the owners for the time being of all fee-farm rents created under this act shall be subject to and charged with the like liabilities, and shall have the like rights and equities to indemnify and to be indemnified in respect of such fee-farm rents respectively, as they would have been subject to, and would have had in respect of the reversions or estates which have been converted into such respective fee-farm rents, in case this act had not been passed.

XII. And be it enacted, that where the owner of any under lease in perpetuity is entitled to require the owner of the lease or superior under-lease out of which such first-mentioned under lease is derived to procure a renewal of such lease or superior under-lease, the owner of such first-mentioned under-lease may, at the time of requiring the owner of such lease or superior under-lease to execute to him a grant under this act, and whether the time for the renewal of such lease or superior under-lease has or has not arrived, also require the owner thereof to procure a like grant to be made to such owner by the owner from whom he is entitled under this act to require such grant; and where a grant has been made under this act to the owner of an under-lease in perpetuity entitled to require the owner of the lease or superior under-lease in perpetuity out of which such first-mentioned under-lease was derived, to procure a renewal of such lease or superior under-lease, and the owner to whom such grant has been made has not at the time of requiring such grant required the owner of such lease or superior under-lease to procure a like grant to be made to such owner, and such grant has not in fact been made to such owner, the owner of the estate into which the estate under such first-mentioned under-lease has been converted shall, at the time when he might if such last-mentioned estate had not been converted have required the owner of such lease or superior under-lease to procure a renewal thereof, be in like manner entitled to require such owner to procure a grant to be made to him under this act.

XIII. And be it enacted, that where any lands comprised in a lease or under-lease to the owner of which a grant is made under this act of an estate of inheritance are comprised in an under-lease in perpetuity to the owner of which the owner of such lease or first-mentioned under-lease has previously made a like grant in such lands, such first-mentioned grant shall operate to supply or feed the grant so previously made and each like grant (if any) previously made by the owner of each inferior under-lease in perpetuity in the same lands, or any part thereof, between which and the secondly before-mentioned under-lease there is no intermediate under-lease in perpetuity subsisting.

XIV. And be it enacted, that where any fee-farm rent shall be charged upon any lands by any grant made under this act, the acquisition of a part of such lands by the person entitled to such fee-farm rent, whether such acquisition shall be by descent, by purchase, or by escheat, shall operate so as to extinguish only a proportionate part of the rent to which such person shall be entitled, and the remaining part of such rent shall be recoverable out of the residue of such lands in the same manner as the whole rent would have been recoverable if such acquisition had not been made; and in such case such fee-farm rent shall be apportioned by the agreement of the persons interested, and in default thereof, according to the relative amounts of the value of the land so acquired and the value of the residue of such lands, in the same manner as rent-service is now by law apportionable upon an alienation of the reversion in part of the lands.

XV. And be it enacted, that where the owner of any reversion, lease, under-lease, or estate is a minor, idiot, lunatic, feme covert, or is not within the United Kingdom, the guardian, trustee, committee of the estate, husband, or attorney respectively of such owner shall for the purpose of this act be substituted in the place of such owner, and shall and may execute such grants and counterparts, make such agreements, and do all such other acts which such owner, if not under disability or out of the United Kingdom, should and might have executed, made, and done, under this act.

XVI. And be it enacted, that where any fee-farm rent made payable by any grant under this act is greater in amount than the rent reserved by the lease or under-lease in perpetuity to the owner of which such grant is made, the party paying such rent shall be entitled to deduct from the party receiving the same the proper poundage in respect of poor's rate from the portion of such rent which by virtue of this act is added to the amount of rent previously payable.

XVII. And be it enacted, that nothing in this act contained shall be deemed to affect or alter the existing liability of any party or parties, or of any estate or interest in respect of the payment or deduction of rent-charge in lieu of tithe.

XVIII. And be it enacted that the fee-farm rent made payable by any grant under this act, or by any grant made after the passing of this act, shall be recoverable by distress, ejectment for nonpayment of rent, action of debt, covenant, and all other ways, means, remedies, actions, suits, or otherwise, by which rent-service reserved on any common lease or demise for a life or lives is or may be by law recoverable; and all the enactments relating to ejectment for nonpayment of rent, distress, or other remedies for the recovering thereof, shall apply to every such fee-farm rent as aforesaid, as fully and effectually as if the same were rent-service reserved on a lease for a life or lives; and in proceedings by ejectment for nonpayment of such fee-farm rent under the statutes for the time being in force in Ireland in relation to ejectment for nonpayment of rent made applicable under this act to such fee-farm rent as aforesaid, the receipt of such fee-farm rent for three years by the lessor of the plaintiff, or any person or persons through whom he claims, shall have the same force and effect as a similar receipt of rent-service reserved on any lease for life or lives would have in proceedings by ejectment for nonpayment of such rent under such statutes; and in avowing or making cognizance for any such fee-farm rent in any action of replevin in respect of a distress for such rent, it shall be sufficient for the person avowing or making cognizance to avow or make cognizance generally, that the lands or place on which such distress was made, or from which such distress was fraudulently removed, (as the case may be,) were or was at the time the rent distrained for accrued and still are or is held under a grant made under or after the passing of this act, and that a certain sum or portion of the said rent was in arrear and unpaid, and that the person avowing, or in whose right cognizance is made in respect of the said rent, is the person entitled thereto, without further setting forth such grant, or the title of such avowant or person in whose right such cognizance is made to such fee-farm rent; and in proceeding by action of debt or covenant for nonpayment of the fee-farm rent made payable by any such grant as aforesaid, or non-performance of any of the covenants contained in such grant, or in any other action or proceeding in relation thereto, it shall be sufficient for the plaintiff, or person entitled to fee-farm rent, to set forth in the declaration, or other pleading the grant, and, where the case shall require, the covenants, the non-performance of which he complains of, and aver that the said plaintiff or other person is the person entitled to the fee-farm rent reserved or made payable by such grant; and, where the case may require, interested in the performance of such covenants, without setting forth or deducing his title thereto; and in such actions of replevin, debt, or covenant, or other proceeding founded on such grant as as aforesaid, proof that the said plaintiff or other person, or any person or persons through whom he claims, has or have been in the possession or in the receipt of such fee-farm rent for three years, shall be sufficient evidence of the title of the plaintiff or other person thereto, as in cases of ejectment for non-payment of rent under the statutes in force in relation thereto; and if in any such action of ejectment as aforesaid, judgment be given for the plaintiff, and execution executed, or if any entry be made in respect to such fee-farm rent as aforesaid, or by virtue of any condition for re-entry contained in any such grant as aforesaid, then the estate in the lands acquired under such judgment and execution, or by such entry, shall be of the like nature, and shall be subject to the same or the like uses, trusts, charges, liens, equities, rights, and incumbrances, as if such judgment and execution or such entry had been in respect of an estate in reversion, and of a rent or a condition, as the case may be, incident thereto, and such estate in reversion had stood limited to the same uses and trusts, and subject to the same charges, liens, equities, rights, and incumbrances, to which such fee-farm rent stood limited or subject.

DUBLIN, MAY 12, 1849.

To provide a remedy for an inconvenience in the state of the law, which frequently inflicted injury and loss on both landlord and tenant, the 9 & 10 Vic. c. 111, was enacted.

The inconvenience we allude to, arose from the tenant having six months after the execution of an habere in an ejectment for non-payment of rent, during which—on payment of the amount due for rent and costs—he could redeem his interest. During these six months the landlord was placed in much difficulty as to the profitable management of his lands, as he was reduced to the necessity either of occupying the farm himself, or of putting a tenant into it, whom, in the event of the former tenant redeeming, he might find much difficulty in removing; and the tenant, whom a temporary embarrassment might have prevented from meeting his engagements, was dislodged from his farm at a time when his superintendence might have been of the utmost importance. Thus the tenant was sometimes ruined by being deprived of the possession of a farm, which was often found of very questionable value to the landlord.

The act under consideration is calculated to remedy these inconveniences. By the 8th section of it, the landlord is enabled to permit a tenant, against whom he has succeeded in ejectment, to hold his farm until the time allowed him for redemption is on the point of expiring, without prejudice to the right of obtaining immediate possession under the habere, at the moment when complete and permanent dominion over the land is restored to the landlord.

The provisions of the 8th section are applicable wherever the sheriff, his bailiff, or officer, is executing any writ of habere in any action of ejectment, or any civil bill decree for the recovery of the possession of lands and tenements; and the extension of these provisions to other cases besides ejectments for non-payment of rent (which class of ejectments alone are contemplated in the other sections of the act) has introduced another element, which may sometimes keep the landlord out of possession of his land for a longer time than he expected or intended.

This new element is thus introduced—a landlord obtaining an habere in an ejectment on the title, is in a very different position from a landlord obtaining one in an ejectment for non-payment of rent; in the latter case the tenant has a clear right to regain possession on certain conditions; in the former, there is nothing which the tenant can do which will so entitle him—his continuance or non-continuance in the occupation of the farm, is entirely at the option of the landlord. If the landlord allow him to remain in possession after the execution of the habere, under the provisions of this act, he is clearly a tenant at will, in the strictest sense of the word, and acquires that uncertainty of tenure which entitles him, if he sow the land, and is put out before he reaps the crop, to have that crop, and free entry, egress, and regress to cut and carry it away, because he knew not at what time the lessor would enter; except, indeed, the statute break in on the principle of the common law.

That this principle of the common law should be upheld at the same time that the provisions of this statute should be carried out, seems to be the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, as expressed in their decision in the case of Lessee Knox v. Gildea, alluded to by us in a former number, and reported in the 11 Irish Law and Equity Reports, page 198, where the order to renew the habere was made absolute, but with a stay of execution until the 1st of November, distinctly on the ground that in the interval that had elapsed, the tenant might have cropped the land. However, though we admire the solicitude with which the Court regarded the interests of occupying tenants, in this instance the reason was not sufficient to satisfy us that the order should not be made absolute without any stay of execution. That the tenants had cropped the lands would have been (in our opinion) a good cause why execution should have been stayed, to enable them to reap the profits of their industry; but that they might have done so, seems hardly sufficient. It appears further, that they had been served with the conditional order, and it might fairly be inferred, that if they had cause to shew, they would not have neglected doing so—that they might have cropped their lands, was a good reason for insisting on the service of the conditional order, but no reason for refusing to render it absolute unconditionally, on proof of service, if no cause were shewn.

But, to return—there are two distinct classes of cases to which the provisions of this 8th section apply; namely, cases where tenants under ejectment for non-payment of rent are permitted to remain in occupation for the time during which the law gives them the right of redemption; and cases where a landlord chooses to permit a tenant, ejected on the title, to remain in possession. These two classes differ completely in the circumstances connected with them, and we are prepared for a difference in the rules made by the court, according as a case brought under their notice belongs to one class or to the other. In cases of ejectment for non-payment of rent, the tenant must be supposed to know whether he is about to redeem or not, and will regulate the management of his farm accordingly. In these cases, we are prepared to find the courts—as the six months allowed for redemption are about expiring—renewing haberes, and putting landlords into immediate possession without hesitation. In cases of ejectment on the title—as the tenant cannot know what the landlord's intention may be—we are, on the contrary, prepared to find the courts making diligent inquiry, as to whether the tenant has been induced, by the indulgence of the landlord, to crop his land, and, in that case, preventing a landlord from taking advantage of the exertions which a tenant might be induced to make in consequence of such indulgence.

We consider the provisions of the 8th section so salutary in their application to the cases of ejectment for non-payment of rent, that we should be glad that they were not only optional, but compulsory. We can easily imagine circumstances where great and unnecessary injury would be occasioned by the landlord refusing to permit under-tenants to continue in occupation of their holdings during the six months allowed for redemption, in the event of the interest being ultimately redeemed.

We can imagine a temporary embarrassment occasioning the non-payment of rent, proceedings in ejectment taken, and an habere obtained by the landlord, who refuses to permit the under-tenants to remain in occupation, according to the provisions of the statute; we can imagine a thousand complicated arrangements existing between the mesne landlord and the under-tenants. The superior landlord has it in his power to disturb all these, and to persevere in this disturbance during six months. Supposing the redemption is not effected till the last moment, and on the supposition that it is effected then, the intermediate disturbance and injury would have been clearly unnecessary. All parties would have been put to inconvenience, even the landlord, without advantage to any.

Other sections of this Act contain important amendments in the law as to ejectment for non-payment of rent. It is reasonable that the tenant should have accurate information as to the amount of rent claimed, as well as the amount claimed for costs, in order to his providing for their payment. The provisions also for staying proceedings, at almost every step in the suit, on payment of the amount due and costs incurred up to that period, are of some importance to the holders of land.

During the past week, a decision was made by the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Brady v. Rotherham, (not yet reported,) as to the effect of a lodgment of money, in discharge of the action, after writ and before declaration. This was the first occasion such a question has been mooted, and the decision of the Court is one which, we apprehend, will have a very considerable influence on the practice of lodging money in discharge of the action, and of changing the venue on the common affidavit.

The action was trover, and after the service of the writ, and before the declaration was filed, the defendant lodged a sum of money in court, and moved on the common affidavit to change the venue. This application was answered by an undertaking to give material evidence in the county where the venue was laid, (the county of the city of Dublin.) At the trial before the Lord Chief Baron, the only material evidence was the defendant's rule on lodging the money. The Chief Baron having refused to non-suit, the plaintiff had a verdict, and the question came before the Court on a motion to change that verdict into a non-suit.

For the defendant, it was contended, that as the lodgment was before declaration, it could not be taken as an admission of a cause of action not disclosed; that it would inflict much hardship on a defendant, who, on being served with a writ indorsed with the amount of debt and costs, as is required in actions ex contractu, and being willing to admit a debt of that character, was then to be declared against in trover, and his admission of the former cause of action, used as an admission of the latter. The answer was, that in this case the defendant had acquiesced in the form of action in which he was sued. The Court decided that the lodgment of the money must, in every case, be taken to be an admission of the demand, and consequently, was material evidence. And during the progress of the argument, suggested that, if a defendant, intending to lodge money to one demand, were surprised by a different one being laid in the declaration, it would be competent for him to apply to the Court for liberty to withdraw the money lodged.

This decision is carrying the effect of an admission by the lodgment further than that given it by the Courts at Westminster, the inclination of the later decisions appearing to be rather in favour of a diminution of its effect. (See Taylor on Evidence, 558, et seq.) This is the only case now on record, in which the lodgment was before declaration; but in future it will, perhaps, be the most advisable period, as, if the plaintiff take the money in discharge, the defendant will be liable merely to the costs of the writ. If the plaintiff goes on, and does not recover more than the sum lodged, according to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Kershaw v. Lindsay, (1, Ir. Jur. 31), the defendant will be entitled to the whole costs; and if the defendant feel himself aggrieved, by any misapprehension as to the nature of the demand in the writ, and that subsequently made in the declaration, he can adopt the suggestion alluded to as having fallen from the Court. Though there is, we believe, no precedent for such a motion, such a one is absolutely necessary to protect a defendant from the inconvenience he would be otherwise subjected to by this decision. On the other hand, the defendant must recollect, that by lodging the money at this period, he deprives himself of the power of changing the venue, except on special grounds.

XIX. And be it enacted, that if in any action or ejectment brought on account of the non-payment of any fee-farm rent made payable by any such grant as aforesaid, pursuant to the statutes for the time being in force in Ireland as to the actions of ejectment for non-payment of rent, judgment be given for the plaintiff, and execution executed, and the person who has made default in payment of the rent, or the person who but for such ejectment would for the time being have been the party to make the payment from time to time thereafter becoming due, do not, within six calendar months from the time of such execution executed, do such acts or take such proceedings as are or may be by law necessary for the redemption of the lands from the said judgment and execution (all which acts and proceedings he is hereby authorized to do and take in the same manner and with the same effect to all intents and purposes as if he were the tenant or lessee of the person causing such ejectment to be brought), then and in every such case it shall be lawful for the owner of or any person having an estate or interest in any fee-farm rent made payable by any such grant as aforesaid out of the whole or any part of such lands, or for the owner of or any person having an estate or interest in the lands out of which such fee-farm rent is payable, or any part thereof, within nine calendar months after such execution executed, to do such acts and take such proceedings for the redemption of the said lands from the said judgment and execution, and for obtaining relief in respect of the same, as under the statutes last aforesaid, any mortgages of a lease might do or take for the redemption of such lease, or his estate or interest therein, from any judgment and execution in any action of ejectment for non-payment of rent pursuant to such statutes, and for obtaining relief in respect of the same; and any redemption made pursuant to such statutes shall operate so as to restore all estates and interests in rents, or in lands which shall have been defeated by the entry or ejectment; and when such redemption as last aforesaid has been made, or when any such redemption has been made under the statutes aforesaid, by any mortgagee or any other person, which redemption he is hereby authorized to make, all sums of money paid or advanced on account thereof, and the costs thereof, shall be, and be deemed a lien and charge in favour of the person paying the same, his executors or administrators, not only upon the estate or interests of the person making such default aforesaid, but upon all the inheritance in which such estate or interest is subsisting, in priority to all other interests or charges whatever upon such inheritance, save and except any charges created under the acts relating to the drainage of lands, or to the improvement of lands in Ireland; and such sums of money and costs shall also be recoverable by the person paying the same from the person who has made such default, or his representatives, in, and by an action of debt; and all sums of money paid and costs incurred in respect of such lien, or charge by any person damnified thereby, shall also be recoverable by such person, from the person who has made default, or his representatives, in manner aforesaid; and it shall be lawful for any person, having the benefit of such lien or charge, or damnified thereby as aforesaid, to apply by petition in a summary way to the Court of Chancery, or Court of Exchequer at the Equity side thereof, for the appointment of a receiver over such estate, interest, or inheritance, and which receiver it shall be lawful for said court respectively to appoint, and to continue until all such sums of money and costs, with interest, and the costs of such petition, and of the proceedings thereunder, are fully paid and discharged, and to make such order in reference to such petition, as to such courts respectively may seem fit.

XX. And be it enacted, that where the owner of any lease or under-lease in perpetuity of any degree of tenure, of lands in Ireland, has required a grant under this act, and the owner of the reversion, lease or superior under-lease, or estate, from whom such grant has been required, disputes the right to such grant, or in case such owners shall differ as to what covenants, conditions, exceptions, or reservations shall be contained in such grant, or what exceptions, reservations, or rights should be commuted, or otherwise, as to the terms or conditions of such grant or the amount of fee-farm rent to be made payable thereunder, or in case the owner of the reversion, superior lease, under-lease, or estate, who might be required to execute a grant under this act be a minor, idiot, lunatic, feme covert or not within the United Kingdom, and there be no guardian, committee of the estate, husband, attorney, respectively, of such owner competent to act under the provision herein-before contained, or there is or are any arrears of rent, fine or fines, or fees, which under this act might be required to be paid before the execution of a grant under this act, and the owner required to execute such grant, has refused to accept payment thereof, or there is no person to whom the same can properly be paid, or it is not known to whom the same ought to be paid, it shall be lawful for the owner of the lease or under-lease in perpetuity, who has required such grant, or would be entitled to require the same, as the case may be, to apply to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, or Court of Exchequer in Ireland, on the equity side thereof, in a summary way by petition praying that a grant may be executed to him under this act, or that it may be declared what covenants, conditions, exceptions or reservations should be contained in such grant, or that any such exceptions, reservations, or rights, as aforesaid, may be commuted, or that the terms or conditions of such grant may be settled, or that the amount of the fee-farm rent may be determined, or such other relief as shall be applicable to the case; and every such petition shall be intituled "In the Matter of the Renewable Leasehold Conversion Act," ex parte the person who presents such petition, and shall state the date and names of the parties to whom, and the short contents of the lease or under-lease in respect of which the same is presented, and of the last renewal thereof, with the name of the lands, and the parish, barony, and county in which the same are situate, and the nature and extent of the estate or interest of the petitioner in such lease or under-lease, and shall, where the right of the petitioner to a renewal of such lease or under-lease is disputed, state that such a right is disputed, and shall state such other matters as the circumstances of the case may require; and every such petition shall be verified by the affidavit of the person by whom the same is presented, or of his solicitor, attorney, or agent, or otherwise as the court shall consider sufficient, and in all cases under this act the reversion, lease, and under-lease respectively shall be sufficiently represented by the respective owners thereof, and it shall not be necessary to bring before the court any other parties interested in such reversion, lease, and under-lease respectively unless in special cases the court shall otherwise direct.

XXI. And be it enacted, that where such petition as aforesaid is presented in respect of a lease or under-lease the right to a renewal of which is disputed such petition shall be heard by the court, and the court may upon hearing determine the right to such renewal, or retain the petition until such right be established on a bill filed or other proper proceeding taken for such purpose, or may refer the said matter of such petition to the Master or Remembrancer, or make such other order in the matter of such petition as the court may think fit; and such petition shall, days before the hearing thereof, be served by or on behalf of the party presenting the same on the owner of the reversion, lease, under-lease, or estate from the owner whereof the grant under this act was required; and where such petition is presented in respect of a lease or under-lease the right to a renewal of which is not disputed, it shall be in the discretion of the court either to make an order for hearing thereon, or else ex parte to make an order referring the matter of such petition to the Master or Remembrancer.

XXII. And be it enacted, that where the matter of any such petition as aforesaid is referred to the Master or Remembrancer, either upon the hearing or ex parte, such Master or Remembrancer shall thereupon proceed to inquire into the matter of such petition, and shall require notice, in such form as he may think fit, of such petition and of the rule or order thereon, and of a time and place for the parties to appear before him, to be served upon the owner of the reversion, lease, under-lease, or estate from the owner whereof the grant under this act was or might be required, or in case such owner be under disability or out of the United Kingdom, and there be no guardian, committee, husband, or attorney, competent to act for such owner under the provision hereinbefore contained, then the Master or Remembrancer may require such substituted service as he may think fit of such notice as aforesaid; and at the time and place fixed by such notice the Master or Remembrancer shall proceed to inquire and ascertain whether the petition is presented by a person entitled to require a grant under the provisions of this act of an estate of inheritance in the lands comprised in the lease or under-lease in perpetuity in respect of which such petition is presented, and in case he so find he shall proceed to ascertain the amount of the fee-farm rent to be made payable by such grant, and to settle the terms and conditions of such grant, in case the parties differ about the same or the nature of the petition shall so require, and when the owner from whom a grant might be required is under disability, and there is no guardian, committee, husband, or attorney as aforesaid of such owner, shall nominate a person to be substituted for the purposes of this act in all proceedings under such petition as aforesaid in the place of such owner; and where there is any arrear or sum of or in respect of rent, or any fine or fines, or fees, which under this act might be required to be paid before the execution of a grant under this act, and the owner required to execute such grant has refused to accept payment thereof, or there is no person to whom the same can properly be paid, or it is not known to whom the same ought to be paid, the Master or Remembrancer shall require the full amount of such arrear or sum of or in respect of rent, and of such fine or fines, with interest thereon, and of such fees, to be lodged, under a special direction of the Master or Remembrancer, in the Bank of Ireland, in the matter of such petition, with the privy of the Accountant-General of the Court, for the use of the party specified in such direction; and the fact of such payment, and the cause or reason of the previous nonpayment of the amount so paid, and the facts relating thereto, shall be stated by the Master or Remembrancer specially in his report.

XXIII. And be it enacted, that the Master or Remembrancer shall make his report in relation to the matter of such petition, and such report shall state the application to the court, and the result of his inquiries and proceedings under the reference, and where the petitioner is entitled to a grant such report shall refer to the draft of the grant as settled or approved by such Master or Remembrancer, and shall state by whom such grant and the counterpart thereof should be executed, or should have been executed if not under disability or out of the United Kingdom, and shall state all such other matters as to the Master or Remembrancer may seem expedient for carrying into due execution the provisions of this act.

XXIV. And be it enacted, that after the Master or Remembrancer has made his report, notice of the filing of such report shall be served by or on behalf of the petitioner on the party on whom notice of the petition is required to be served; and at any time before the expiration of the next ensuing term after such service it shall be lawful for the petitioner or the party so served, or any other person interested in the matter of the petition or report (such other person first obtaining, on an ex parte motion, the leave of the court so to apply,) to apply to the court by motion on notice to the opposite party, or where the application is by any such other person as aforesaid, on notice to both parties to the proceedings under the petition, and to such other persons (if any) as the court may, on such ex parte application as aforesaid, have directed, to set aside such report, or to vary or amend the same in any particulars specified in such notice of motion; and thereupon it shall be lawful for the court to make such order in relation to the matters aforesaid as the court may think fit; and the court, if it so think fit, may, upon the hearing of any such motion, either wholly confirm such report, or vary or amend the same in the particulars mentioned in such notice, or in any other particulars, and confirm the same, with such variations or amendments; and in case no such application be made to the court within such time as aforesaid, such report may and shall be confirmed according to the course and practice of the court.

XXV. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the court, upon the hearing of any such motion, made on notice as aforesaid, or upon any application made after the confirmation of the Report, where it may see fit so to do, on account of the disability, absence, or refusal of any person by whom the grant or counterpart respectively should be executed, to order that such grant or counterpart, as the case may be, be executed by the Master or Remembrancer; and every grant and counterpart respectively so executed shall have the same force and effect as if the same had been executed by the owner of the reversion, lease, superior under-lease, or estate, or lease, under-lease, or inferior under-lease, as the case may be, on account of whom the same is so executed by the Master or Remembrancer.

XXVI. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the owner of an under-lease in perpetuity immediately derived out of a lease in perpetuity, where such owner is entitled to require the owner of the lease in perpetuity to procure the renewal thereof, and whether the time for renewal of such lease or under-lease has or has not arrived, to apply to the Court of Chancery, or to the Court of Exchequer at the Equity side thereof, by petition, in manner herein-before mentioned, praying that a grant may be executed to the owner of such under-lease under this act, and also praying that a like grant may be made by the owner of the reversion to and accepted by the owner of such lease in perpetuity; and praying such other relief as may be applicable to the case; and it shall be lawful for the owner of an inferior under-lease in perpetuity entitled to require the owner of the immediately superior under-lease in perpetuity to procure a renewal thereof, and whether the time for the renewal of such inferior under-lease or of any under-lease superior thereto or of the lease in perpetuity has or has not arrived, to apply by petition as aforesaid, praying that a grant may be executed to such first-mentioned owner under this act, and also praying that the like grant or grants (as the case may require) may be made to and accepted by the owner of the immediately superior under-lease in perpetuity, and to and by the owner of each under-lease in perpetuity (if any) superior to such under-lease (where such owner is under the like obligation to the owner of the immediately inferior under-lease in perpetuity to procure renewal, and to and by the owner of the lease in perpetuity where such owner is under the like obligation to the owner of the immediately under-lease in perpetuity to procure renewal) from the owner or respective owners from whom a grant or grants might be required under this act by such respective owners as aforesaid, and praying all such other relief in relation to such grant or grants as may be applicable to the case; and upon such petition being presented it shall be in the discretion of the court to make an order for hearing thereon, or, ex parte, to make an order referring the matter of such petition to the Master or Remembrancer; and all such inquiries, directions, orders, and proceedings shall and may be made, given, and taken in relation to the several grants prayed for by such petition as if such grants had been prayed for by the owners to whom such grants are thereby prayed to be made; and all the provisions herein contained in relation to the proceedings by and before the Master or Remembrancer, his report, and the execution by him of a grant or counterpart upon or after a reference to such Master or Remembrancer under a petition presented under the provision herein-before contained, shall extend and be applicable to a reference to the Master or Remembrancer, under a petition presented under this provision; and where there is any arrear or sum of or in respect of rent, or any fine or fines, or fees, which under this act might be required to be paid before the execution of a grant under this act, and the owner to whom such grant should be made neglects or refuses to pay the same within such time as the Master or Remembrancer or the court may appoint, it shall be lawful for any person interested in the lands to be comprised in the grant or in any fee-farm rent to be made payable out of such lands or any part thereof, and who shall be in this behalf authorised by the Master or Remembrancer or the Court to pay such arrear or sum of or in respect of rent, and such fine or fines, with interest thereon, and such fees; and all sums so paid, and the costs (if any) incurred in relation to such payment, shall be deemed a like lien and charge in favour of the person praying the same, his executors or administrators, and with the like priority as herein-before provided in the case of money paid on account of the redemption of lands from a judgment and execution in ejectment, and the costs of such redemption, subject only to the priority given to the charge and lien created in respect of such money and costs as last aforesaid, and all sums of money paid under this provision and the costs in relation to such payment, shall also be recoverable by all the like ways and means, with the costs of the proceedings for recovery thereof, as money paid for such redemption as aforesaid and the costs thereof are under the provision herein-before contained recoverable.

XXVII. And be it enacted, that all persons who shall become parties to any proceedings under this act, by making any application to the court, or by submitting to the jurisdiction thereof, or by attending before the Master or Remembrancer in the course of such proceedings, or by otherwise taking part therein, and the representatives of the petitioner, and of all such persons, and all persons claiming under him or them by their act or by act of law subsequent to their becoming subject, shall for the purposes of this act be subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and to all orders of the court and of the Master or Remembrancer in the course of any such proceedings in like manner and as fully as parties to a cause pending in the court are so subject in such cause.

XXVIII. And be it enacted, that in order to enable the Master or Remembrancer to ascertain such particulars as it may be necessary for him to ascertain upon any reference to him under this act, he shall be at liberty to examine upon oath the party who has presented any petition, and to inquire by affidavit and by examination of witnesses, and by other evidence, respecting any of the matters referred to him; and the owner of any lease or under-lease respecting which any inquiry is made as herein-before directed shall, when thereto required by the Master or Remembrancer, produce such lease or under-lease, and all other deeds or instruments under or by virtue of which such owner holds the lands respecting which such inquiry is made, and shall produce and furnish such proof or information as the Master or Remembrancer requires as to the rent, fine or fines, and fees (if any) payable under such lease or under-lease, and as to the existence and the age of the person or persons upon whose life or lives (if any) such lease or under-lease depends, and as to the rent, fines, interest, and fees (if any) which have become due or payable.

XXIX. And be it enacted, that whenever any notice required to be given by this act, or which is required or necessary for carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act, cannot be given or delivered to the person to or for whom such notice is directed or intended, it shall be sufficient for the person obliged to give such notice to leave the same at the last known or most usual place of abode of the person to or for whom such notice is directed or intended, with an inmate of such place of abode aged sixteen years or upwards, if such place of abode be within Ireland, and if the same be not within Ireland, then to serve such notice on the agent or attorney of such person, or the receiver of the rents of his estate, and if such agent, attorney, or receiver cannot be discovered, then it shall be sufficient service of such notice to publish the same at least once in each week, in two successive weeks, by advertisement in the Dublin Gazette and in two newspapers published in Dublin, and in one newspaper circulating in the county in which the lands to which the notice relates or the greater part thereof are situate, and also to give such notice to any principal occupier of any of such lands, or, if the Master or Remembrancer so direct, to send such notice by the post to the last known address of the party on whom the same shall be required to be served, within such period as to admit of its being delivered within the period prescribed, if any, for such notice to be given, or to serve such notice on such person and in such manner as the Master or Remembrancer directs.

XXX. And be it enacted, that the proceeding under this act shall abate or be suspended by any death or transmission of interest, except so far as it shall be deemed necessary for the carrying on of such proceedings that any person not before the court should have notice of or be required to attend such proceedings; and in case of death or transmission of interest, and wherever, after the presentation of a petition under this act, the direction of the court is requisite for carrying on the proceedings under the same, or for effecting the objects thereof, or otherwise relative thereto, it shall be lawful for any person interested in such proceedings to apply to the court for an order for any such purpose, and it shall be lawful for the court to make such order on any such application as it may see fit.

XXXI. And be it enacted, that the costs of all proceedings by and under any petition presented under this act shall be in the discretion of the court.

XXXII. And be it enacted, that all the provisions of this act in relation to the amount of the fee-farm rent to be made payable by a grant under this act, and the covenants, conditions, exceptions, and reservations to be contained in such grant, the commutation of exceptions, reservations, and rights, the allocation of land, and all other provisions of this act concerning such grant and the effect and consequences thereof, shall, so far as the same are consistent with the provisions of this act in relation to the proceedings by and under and consequential upon a petition presented under this act, extend and be applicable to every such grant for or in relation to which a petition is presented.

XXXIII. And be it enacted, for the purposes of this act every person seized of or entitled at law or in equity to the reversion expectant on any lease in perpetuity as tenant in fee simple or in fee tail, general or special, or as tenant in dower or by the curtesy, or for life or lives, or for years determinable on a life or lives, or for a term of years absolute of which forty years or more are unexpired at the time of the application for a grant under this act, and also every feoffee or trustee (for charitable or other purposes whatsoever) of any such reversion as aforesaid, for any such estate or interest therein as aforesaid, (whether such estate or interest be or not determinable upon the execution or fulfilment of any trusts,) who is in the actual receipt of the rent reserved by any lease in perpetuity, and every executor or administrator who in that capacity, or as a special occupant of an estate pour autre vie or as being entitled to an estate pour autre vie under any statute or otherwise, is in such receipt as aforesaid, and also any archbishop, bishop, parson, or other ecclesiastical person as to a reversion held by him in his corporate capacity, shall be deemed to be the owner of the reversion; and every person entitled at law or in equity to a lease or under-lease in perpetuity for the whole estate created or agreed to be created by such lease or under-lease, or for any derivative estate (created by any instrument other than an under-lease at a rent) in tail, or quasi in tail, for life or lives, or for a term of years absolute, of which not less than twenty years or more are unexpired at the time of the application under this act for a grant to or by the owner of such lease or under-lease, and also every feoffee or trustee (for charitable or other purposes whatsoever) of any such lease or under-lease in perpetuity as aforesaid, for such estate therein as aforesaid (whether such estate be or not determinable upon the execution or fulfilment of any trusts,) who is in the actual possession of the land or in receipt of the rents payable by the tenants thereof, and every executor or administrator who in that capacity, or as a special occupant of an estate pour autre vie, or as being entitled to an estate pour autre vie under any statute or otherwise, is in such possession or receipt as aforesaid, shall be deemed the owner of such lease or under-lease in perpetuity; and where a feme covert is entitled to rents and profits for her separate use (whether or not she be restrained from anticipation) she shall, for the purposes of this act, be considered a feme sole: provided always, that no person shall be deemed an owner for the purposes of this act of the reversion, or of any lease or under-lease in perpetuity, by reason of any estate vested in him which has been created by way of mortgage, or for securing the payment of any sum of money, unless he be in the receipt of the rent incident to the reversion, or in possession of the land comprised in such lease or under-lease, or in receipt of the rents payable by the tenants thereof (as the case may be,) but the person who would be deemed the owner for the purposes of this act of such reversion, or lease or under-lease in perpetuity, if such estate by way of mortgage or for securing payment had not been created, shall, notwithstanding such estate, be deemed such owner as aforesaid: provided also, that where several persons in succession have in the reversion or lease or under-lease in perpetuity such estates or interests as would under this enactment entitle each of them to be deemed the owner, such of the said persons shall be deemed the owner for the purposes of this act as is in receipt of the rent incident to the reversion, or in possession of the land comprised in such lease or under-lease, or in receipt of the rents payable by the tenants thereof, as the case may be: or in case the person in such receipt or possession be not entitled to be deemed the owner under this enactment, then the person who has the first such estate or interest as aforesaid in reversion or remainder to or above the estate or interest of the person in such receipt or possession shall be deemed the owner of such reversion, or lease or under-lease in perpetuity; provided also, that in every case in which any person, not being the owner as herein-before defined, is in possession or receipt as herein-before mentioned under any charge, or any sequestration, extent, elegit, or other writ of execution, or as a receiver under any decree or order of a Court of Equity, the person in possession or in receipt of the rents by virtue of such charge, sequestration, extent, elegit, writ, decree, or order, shall, jointly with the person who but for such possession or receipt would under this enactment be deemed the owner of the reversion or lease or under-lease in perpetuity, as the case may be, be deemed to be the owner for the purposes of this act of the reversion or lease or under-lease in perpetuity, as the case may be.

XXXIV. And be it enacted, that every person who under the provisions herein-before contained would for the purposes of this act be deemed the owner of the reversion or of a lease or under-lease in perpetuity if the same were not converted under this act, shall, where such reversion, or the estate held under such lease, or under-lease, has been so converted be, deemed for the purposes of this act the owner of the estate created by such conversion.

XXXV. And be it enacted, that every lease of lands in Ireland, for one or more life or lives, with or without a term of years, or for years determinable upon one or more life or lives, or for years absolute, with a covenant or agreement for perpetual renewal, made after the passing of this act, by any person competent to convey an estate of inheritance in fee-simple (and not so made in pursuance of a covenant or agreement entered into before the passing of this act), shall, notwithstanding anything therein contained to the contrary, be deemed to be, and shall operate as a conveyance of the lands specified therein to the intended lessee, his heirs and assigns for ever, at a fee-farm rent equal to the rent expressed to be reserved in such lease, and all reservation of fine or fines upon, or fees for or in respect of such renewal, and all and every covenant contract, or agreement for the payment of such fines or fees, shall be altogether void; and every contract for such a lease entered into, after the passing of this act, by any such person as aforesaid, (not being a renewal of a contract in pursuance of an agreement in that behalf, made before the passing of this act), shall, notwithstanding anything therein contained to the contrary, be deemed to be a contract for a conveyance of the lands specified therein to the intended lessee, his heirs and assigns, a fee-farm rent equal to the rent in such contract proposed to be reserved: and any such fee-farm rent shall be recoverable by all the means and remedies provided for the recovery of fee farm rents, made payable by a grant under this act, and the provisions of this act, so far as the same may be applicable, shall be applied to such cases.

XXXVI. And be it enacted, that the following words and expressions shall, in this act, have the meanings hereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction; (that is to say,) words importing the singular number only, shall include the plural number, and the words importing the plural number only shall include also the singular number; words importing the masculine gender only shall include females; the word "person" and the word "owner" shall extend to a body politic, corporate, or collegiate, aggregate or sole; the word "lands," shall extend to messuages, tenements, and hereditaments; the word "lease" shall include a grant or an agreement or contract for a lease or grant; and the word "under-lease" shall include a grant or an assignment or contract for an under-lease or grant, and shall include an under-lease carved out of an under-lease in any degree of tenure; the expression "lease in perpetuity" shall be taken to apply to all cases where any hereditaments have been or shall be, by a lease or contract derived immediately from the freehold and inheritance, demised, leased, or granted, or contracted to be demised, leased, or granted, for one or more life or lives, with or without a term of years, or for years determinable upon one or more life or lives, or for years absolute, with a covenant or agreement, by a party competent thereto, in any of such cases, whether contained in the instrument by which such lease or contract is made or in a separate instrument, for the perpetual renewal of such lease or contract; the expression "under-lease in perpetuity" shall be taken to apply to all cases where any of the land comprised in any such lease in perpetuity or contract for a lease in perpetuity have been or shall be under-leased or granted, or contracted to be under-leased or granted, for one or more life or lives, with or without a term of years, or for years determinable upon one or more life or lives, or for years absolute, with a covenant or agreement, whether contained in the instrument by which such under-lease or contract for an under-lease is made or in a separate instrument, for the perpetual release of such under-lease or contract; and for the purposes of this act an assignment reserving a yearly rent, or a contract for such assignment, shall be deemed to be an under-lease or contract for an under-lease respectively, although the person making such assignment or contract may have parted with or agreed to part with his whole estate in the hereditaments therein comprised; and the word "covenant" shall be deemed to include an agreement; and the word "fine" shall include not only a sum of money, but any heriot, matter, or thing to be given or done upon or for or in consideration of the obtaining of any renewal; and "the Court" shall mean the Court of Chancery or the Court of Exchequer, as the case may be, to which a petition shall be presented under this act; and the word "Master" shall mean any of the Masters in Ordinary of the Court of Chancery; and the word "Remembrancer" shall mean the Chief or Second Remembrancer of the Court of Exchequer.

XXXVII. And be it enacted, that in citing this act in other acts of parliament, or in legal instruments or pleadings, it shall be sufficient to use the expression "The Renewable Leasehold Conversion Act;" and in like manner, in like cases, describing any fee-farm rent payable under the provisions of this act, it shall be sufficient to use the expression "Fee-farm Rent under the Renewable Leasehold Conversion Act."

XXXVIII. And be it enacted, that this act shall extend only to lands situate in that part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland called Ireland.

XXXIX. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed during this present session of parliament.

Particulate March 24.

Sir,
"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it useful those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has many advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture, is susceptible of a very high polish. It does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

The Rate in Aid: a Letter to the Right Hon. the Earl of Roden. K.P. By Isaac Butt, Esq., Q.C.
Dublin: M'Glashan.

It is pleasant to find a man of ability and experience devoting leisure moments, snatched from the pursuit of a laborious profession, to the illustration of subjects of great difficulty and national importance. Such an illustration has lately appeared in the form of a letter on the rate in aid, addressed to the Earl of Roden by Mr. Butt. In this letter, the subject of our present notice, the writer does not confine himself to a narrow or partial view of this difficult question. He discusses the whole system of relief under the Irish poor law, noticing, in rapid retrospect, the circumstances and enquiries which led to the enactment of the first act in 1837, tracing its operation to the appearance of the potato famine in 1845, and from thence to the proposal for the rate in aid in 1849, demonstrating the ruinous character of a system which increases pauperism at the same time that it diminishes the fund from which destitution is to be relieved. Entering into statistical details, he points out, firstly, that every acre of cultivated land in England produces, upon an average, very nearly twice as much as the same quantity in Ireland; and, secondly, that the quantity of land on which, in England, two agricultural labourers are located, must in Ireland give sustenance to five, and hence that one great element towards rendering the country self-supporting, must be sought in increasing the productive power of the soil—which the measure of the minister has no tendency to encourage. Viewing the question politically, he points out that the imposition of this tax is to declare the act of Union a nullity; and looking at the purposes to which some of the proceeds of the rate would be applied—in the payment of debts due by some of the southern and western unions—he shews that it would be almost as just to propose to levy an equal tax on all the properties of Ireland, to pay off the incumbrances that press heavily on some of her proprietors, as to call upon one part of Ireland to repay the sums advanced for building workhouses in another.

But it is easy to indicate the evils of this system —to show that if persevered in it must lead to universal confiscation and beggary—Mr. Butt goes farther, and suggests means by which the country might be rescued from its present calamitous condition. In making his suggestion, our author does not rely on any legislative enactment, vis viribus being adequate to work the regeneration he contemplates as possible. He relies, in the first instance, on an effort on the part of Irishmen themselves, to call into action the resources of the country. The prosperity of every country depends upon the exertions and enterprise of the people themselves; to stimulate and aid in such efforts is all that governments and legislatures can effect. He proposes that the Irish gentry should make common cause with their country—that they should endeavour to raise the condition of the mass of her people. Until they are made comfortable, all hope of building up the superstructure of society is vain; and this can be effected only by the determination and energy of Irishmen themselves. He demonstrates the folly of relying solely on the introduction of English capital. "Capital lies around us—it lies in the productive energies of our soil—it lies in our uncultivated wastes—it lies in our teeming fisheries—it lies in the sinews of the men, that famine is wasting from our land." It is idle to suppose that it will be impossible to find spades for the very labourers whom the poor rate is supporting—to turn this labour into a profitable channel, would require an alteration in the law; but if the Irish gentry do not make an effort to help themselves, it is impossible any act of the legislature can save them.

With this view he proposes that the nobility and gentry of Ireland should form themselves into a voluntary association, whose care it would be "to obtain and diffuse information as to the available resources of the country—the methods by which they could be best drawn into action—and the means by which our people could be best employed;" followed up by voluntary associations in every district, of which the boards of guardians might form the nucleus, who would devise and forward the best means of employing the poor and elevating their condition—of establishing manufactories, even the rudest, fostering those which were established—stimulating the industry, and instructing the efforts of the population.

Subsidiary to this great combined effort on the part of all interested in the prosperity of the country, Mr. Butt proposes that speedy and effectual assistance should be afforded from the imperial exchequer for the completion of railway communication in Ireland—for the establishment of a packet station on the western coast, and a dockyard in some of our harbours—a thorough amendment of the poor law, basing it on the good old poor law of Queen Elizabeth—the establishment of an Irish board of trade and plantations, with large and extensive powers for the compulsory purchase of reclaimable lands, into whose reclamation and improvement might be absorbed, in part, the surplus labour of the country. He suggests also a measure to regulate emigration.

The most important part (in a legislative point of view) of Mr. Butt's suggestions, are those by which he proposes to provide the funds that may be necessary to carry out the relief of the labouring population, in districts where the local resources are unequal to the task. He proposes, 1st, To tax the property of all absentees.

2nd, To levy a small tax on articles of manufacture imported into Ireland.

3rd, To levy a tax on all official salaries in Ireland, and on all realised property not otherwise liable to poor rate.

4th, That such portions of the revenue as are exclusively raised in Ireland, should be devoted to Irish purposes. The funds thus derived, and which he calculates would amount at least to one million and a half of annual income, he proposes to place at the disposal of his board of trade and plantations.

Whether these enactments and amendments are the very best that could be adopted under the circumstances, we do not here pronounce, further than that they would, if carried out, be a great improvement on the present system, which expects, by a sort of counter-irritation, that Ireland should grow rich under pauperising treatment. Mr. Butt's suggestions as to the combination of Irishmen for their common salvation, are dictated by the most earnest desire to benefit his country; and if he could succeed in rousing the Irish gentry to energy, and in persuading them to unite, he would do more towards this end than one thousand acts of parliament could effect. Whether he will succeed in this effort or not, he has proved to demonstration that great and fundamental alterations are required in the present poor law.

The letter bears the traces of having been thrown together perhaps too hurriedly, and at intervals, and as rapidly as the ideas suggested themselves to the mind of the writer—that is, with the rapidity of a man of the quickest possible apprehension. The composition is easy, and some passages are in Mr. Butt's best style. He thus describes the appearance of the population in the south of Ireland:—"In the great cities in the South of Ireland—in every step the traveller is beset by famished applicants for relief, protesting that they have not eaten food for days—protests, to the truth of which their emaciated forms and hunger-worn faces bear too terrible attestation. There are districts in Ireland, in which not one family of a hundred has once known for months the luxury of an unstinted meal. Those who visit the remote parts of Ireland periodically,—gentlemen of a profession, on the circuit, can see the population dwindling away; the strong and hale, and powerful turbulent peasant of a few years ago, is now wasted to the weak and miserable and half-starved peasant that sits, listless and idle, on the flags of the public streets. The crowds of stalwart and sturdy men that used to throng the streets of an assize town, or fill the court-house, when some trial which interested the populace was going on, are now to be seen, or seen wasted and worn, as the component parts of a rabble, that seems like a collection of the dismissed occupants—as, probably, many of them are—of a work-house. The witnesses who come upon the table apparently do not belong to the same race that we remember to have seen occupying their place a few years ago. The very criminals in the dock present a different aspect from those of former times. Famine—famine, want, and misery have stamped their visible impress upon the whole population." Mr. Butt thus truly describes the pauperizing effect of the present poor-law:—"The man who a few years ago was a farmer, with a few acres of land, comfortable and well-to-do in the world, is now in many instances a pauper receiving out-door relief; pressed down by the burden of the poor-rate, he has been unable to maintain himself and his family by the cultivation of his little farm. He abandons it to his landlord, and a struggle with starvation, that, occupying no less time, he may become destitute according to law. The land remains uncultivated and untilled; the poor rates accumulate upon it, and the landlord is obliged to pay them, while at the same time he loses his rent. He must curtail his expenditure, and probably by dismissing some of his labourers: these again are thrown upon the poor-rate, and aggravate and increase the evil that is thus perpetually reproducing itself. As the pauperism of the country increases, the produce of the land is diminished, and the little fund that in the hands of the employers of labour constituted at once the chief support of the labouring population and the capital of reproductive exertion, is transferred, under the name of poor-rate, to the expensive sustenance of the same population as idle paupers; and, producing nothing in return, it perishes in the transfer. The rewards of industry are gone; all that stimulates exertion in any class is destroyed. The landlord looks sullenly on the work of confiscation, which he has no power to arrest or control. The farmer who has any substance left, begins to think only of emigration, and too often believes himself justified if in his flight he can spoil the Egyptian, by carrying off the landlord's rent; while for the peasant of a little lower class his country presents no object of ambition but a place in the work-house.* And again—"The great and fatal mistake committed by the framers of the poor-law for Ireland, was this,—they legislated as if they had to deal with isolated instances of occasional distress—as if their only object should be to provide temporary relief for those who might happen to fall below the ordinary condition of the people; whereas, in truth and fact, to deal with the destitution of Ireland was, in many of its districts, to deal with a whole population sunk in misery—to provide the means of decent and adequate living for a labouring class that had not enough to eat."

We will give but one other quotation, which is pregnant with matter for serious reflection to the proprietary of Ireland, and which ought to urge them to that union and combined exertion which Mr. Butt so energetically recommends:—"Can you not perceive, in this proposition of a rate in aid, and the perseverance in a system of poor-law taxation unaccompanied by one single measure of general relief and general improvement, that the decree has gone forth from the ministry for your destruction—that every measure of social regeneration is to be postponed until you are destroyed—and Ireland left a pliant and plastic mould in the hands of her masters."

The appendix to his pamphlet contains a bold dash at the system of Chancery Receivers. We were glad that the evils of it had not escaped his attention, or the censure of his masterly pen. Whatever may be the judgment of the reader as to the practicability of some of Mr. Butt's suggestions, we are satisfied that he will rise from a perusal of them with the thorough conviction that they have been advanced with the greatest earnestness and sincerest desire of the writer to benefit his suffering countrymen, and to elevate the condition of that country, whose cause he has pleaded with his wonted animation—a cause that we trust he will find not hopeless. Though the body politic may be in spasms, yet her structure and frame are still susceptible of healthy re-animation.

We give elsewhere an analysis of the Bill for the Sale of Incumbered Estates. Its fate, as we have already observed, will depend on so many intrinsic and extrinsic causes, that a pronunciamiento upon its efficacy would be as unwise as rash. It may be, that it will be found "to disturb, yet not to settle," or it may be found to work with effectiveness and success. The Court of Chancery had grown into disrepute; it was said to be both dilatory and expensive. Much of this reproach was undeserved; it arose from the complication of interests with which it had to deal—its desire to do perfect justice, to embrace every claim and conclude every right.

Re-construction and reform would have been judicious. We pause before we pronounce our approval on the wisdom of absolute transfer, even for a limited period, to a tribunal almost absolute, with the power of making its own decisions irreversible.

Until the directions and regulations which the Commissioners (sections 9, 10) are empowered to make shall have been promulgated, we grope, in some measure, in the dark—we are thrown on the wild ocean of conjecture, as to the real bearings of the measure.

It will be seen that the new Judges are not only to sell, but to divide the proceeds; this necessarily involves all the working of an Equity suit. We do not object to the power being vested in the Commissioners; on the contrary, we think it salutary that the same tribunal should initiate and consummate; but we must be satisfied that the power will be prudently, vigilantly, and properly exercised.

The proposed bill goes further than its predecessor, which limited applications to the first incumbrancer, or the incumbrancer having possession of the title deeds. By the 16th section of the present measure, any incumbrancer may, within three years from passing of the act, apply for a sale.

The limitation in the last act had, unquestionably, a tendency to render it nugatory, as the first incumbrancer was little disposed to call in a claim which was reasonably secured, and when there was no better outlet for investment. It has often surprised us, that so few mortgages in Ireland contain a power of sale, the exercise of which extrajudicially, would be equally efficacious, and incomparably less expensive. The frequency of judgments, and the infrequency of mortgages, has been the main cause of the multiplicity of Equity suits and their consequence, judicial sales.

The former act (section 28) contained a saving as to the rights of lessees at a rent, subject to whose lease the owner or incumbrancer should be an owner or incumbrancer, as pointed out by Mr. Smythe, in his work on the late measure. This saving would render necessary registry searches, and abstracts of title. The new bill contains no similar saving, but the Commissioners (section 20) are to ascertain the tenancies of occupying tenants and lessees, and the sale shall be made subject thereto.

We presume the intention is, for the Commissioners to take the burden of inquiry, and to let none devolve on the purchaser. The conveyance is to refer to the tenancies, but there is no saving, as we have mentioned.

There is, after all, something unsatisfactory in a purchaser not being shown, by an abstract, that every requisition is complied with, every link complete.

The purchaser gets his conveyance and a parliamentary title; but if the entire responsibility of that title be thrown on the solicitor for the vendor, and no inquiry be rendered necessary on that of the purchaser, we question whether title will be as satisfactorily deduced as when there is an assurance of a zealous scrutiny on the part of a purchaser, who knows that he purchases at his own risk, and without warranty.*

* The analysis of the bill, by an uncontrollable fatality, was not ready for this week's publication.

Directions for Officer upon the issuing of a renewal of a Habere under the 8 & 9 Vic. c. 111.

THE Order for liberty to issue a renewal of an habere, under the 8 & 9 Vic. c. 111, shall be an absolute one in the first instance, but shall contain a direction that the same shall be served, together with a notice annexed, signed by or on behalf of the plaintiff's attorney, with the place of his registered lodgings, specified in the terms, or to the effect following:

"All persons served with this order are to take notice that the same is an absolute order of the Court, and that if they have any objection to make thereto, which may entitle them to insist that it should be discharged, varied or limited, such objection can only be made within the time therein specified by a special application to the Court, or one of the Barons thereof for that purpose."

And such order shall direct that the said renewal shall not be executed for three weeks after the service of the Order, and the above notice. And the proper officer, who shall sign the said renewal, shall retain the same in his possession, to be handed by him to the plaintiff's attorney, upon the filing of an affidavit of the service of such order and notice, and the expiration of the time in such order mentioned.

99. That for the purpose of transmitting any such recognizance through the post, the clerk or one of the clerks assistant of the House of Commons, or some other person appointed by the Speaker for that purpose, shall carry such recognizance under a cover directed to the Lord Chief Baron or one of the barons of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, or to one of the judges of the court of session discharging for the time the powers and duties of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, as the case may require, to the General Post Office in London, and there deliver the same to the postmaster general for the time being, or to such other person as the said postmaster general shall depute to receive the same (and which deputation such postmaster general is required to make,) who on receipt thereof shall give an acknowledgment in writing of such receipt to the person from whom the same is received, and shall keep a duplicate of such acknowledgment, signed by the parties respectively to whom the same is so delivered; and the said postmaster general shall dispatch all such recognizances by the first post or mail after the receipt thereof to the person to whom the same is directed, accompanied with proper directions to the postmaster or deputy postmaster of the town or place to which the same is directed, requiring such postmaster or deputy postmaster forthwith to carry such recognizance, and to deliver the same to the person to whom the same is directed, who (or some officer appointed by the court for that purpose,) is hereby required to give to such postmaster or deputy postmaster a memorandum in writing under his hand, acknowledging the receipt of every such recognizance, and setting forth the day and hour the same was delivered by such postmaster or deputy postmaster, which memorandum shall also be signed by such postmaster or deputy postmaster, and by him transmitted by the first or second post afterwards to the said postmaster general, or his deputy, at the General Post Office in London.

100. That all monies which shall be received or recovered by reason or in pursuance of the estreating of any such recognizance shall, after deducting all expenses incurred in respect thereof, be forthwith paid by the proper officer for that purpose into the bank of England, to the account of the Speaker and of the examiner of recognizances, and shall be applied by them, in manner hereinafter mentioned, in satisfaction, so far as the same will extend, of the costs and expenses intended to be secured by such recognizances.

101. That any person who has entered into any such recognizance may, before the same has been estrated, pay the sum of money for which he is bound by such recognizance into the bank of England, to the account of the Speaker and the examiner of recognizances; and upon production to the examiner of recognizances of a bank receipt or certificate for the sum so paid in, he shall endorse on the recognizance in respect of which such money has been so paid in a memorandum of such payment, and thereupon such recognizance shall, so far as regards the person by or on whose behalf such money has been so paid, be deemed to be vacated, and shall not afterwards be enforced, but such recognizances shall continue to be in force as regards any other person who has entered into the same.

102. That in every case in which any money is paid into the bank of England to the account of the Speaker and the examiner of recognizances, a bank receipt or certificate of the amount so paid in shall be delivered to the examiner of recognizances by the person paying in the same, and such money shall, and in such order of payment as the examiner of recognizances with the approbation of the Speaker, thinks fit, be applied in satisfaction of all the costs and expenses for securing payment of which such investment was made, or so much thereof as can be thereby satisfied, and thereafter the residue (if any) shall be paid to or transferred to the account of the party by whom or on whose account the same was paid in.

103. That if any sheriff or other returning officer shall wilfully delay, neglect, or refuse duly to return any person who ought to be returned to serve in parliament for any county, city, borough, district of burghs, port, or place within Great Britain or Ireland, such person may, in case it have been determined by a select committee appointed in the manner herein-before directed that such person was entitled to have been returned, sue the sheriff or other officer having so wilfully delayed, neglected, or refused duly to make such return at his election, in any of Her Majesty's courts of record at Westminster or Dublin, or in the court of session in Scotland, and shall recover double the damages he has sustained by reason thereof, together with full costs of suit; provided such action be commenced within one year after the commission of the act on which it is grounded, or within six months after the conclusion of any proceedings in the House of Commons relating to such election.

104. That this act shall commence and take effect from the end of this session of parliament.

105. That if at the close of the present session of parliament there be any election petitions before the house, the order for taking which into consideration has not been discharged, and for trying which no committees have been appointed, such election petitions shall, in case the sureties relating thereto have been reported unobjectionable, be tried by committees to be chosen under the provisions of this act, and shall be referred to the general committee of elections before any petition presented in the next session; and the general committee shall, within two days after their first meeting, appoint a day and hour for selecting a committee to try every such petition; and if the present parliament be prorogued after the appointment of a select committee for the trial of any such petition as aforesaid, and before they have reported to the house their determination thereon, such committee shall not be dissolved by such prorogation, but shall be adjourned in manner herein-before provided in the case in which parliament is prorogued after the appointment of a select committee for the trial of an election petition, and before they have reported to the house their determination thereon; and in the case of all such petitions as aforesaid, all such further proceedings shall be had with reference thereto as if this act had been in force when such petitions were presented; and the recognizances entered into in respect of such petitions shall be taken to be and remain in force, and shall take effect for securing payment of all costs and expenses which the petitioners shall be liable to pay, as if the same had been entered into under the provisions of this act.

106. That no recognizance entered into, or affidavit sworn, under the provisions of this act, shall require to be impressed with any stamp.

107. That in citing this act it shall be sufficient in all cases to use the expression "the election petitions act, 1848."

108. That in construing this act words importing the singular number only shall include the plural number, and words importing the plural number only shall include the singular, unless there be something in the subject or the context repugnant to such construction; and the words "oath" and "affidavit" respectively shall mean affirmation in the case of Quakers, or any declaration lawfully substituted for an oath in the case of persons allowed by law to make a declaration instead of taking an oath.

109. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

SCHEDULE.

Be it remembered, that on the _____ day of _____ in the year of our Lord 184____, before me A. B. Esquire [examiner of recognizances for the House of Commons, or one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the _____ of _____] came _____ and acknowledged himself [or severally acknowledged themselves] to owe to our Sovereign Lady the Queen the sum of £1000 [or the following sums, (that is to say,)] the said _____ the sum of _____ the said _____ the sum of _____ the said _____ the sum of _____ and the said _____ the sum of _____, to be levied on his [or their respective] goods and chattels, lands and tenements, to the use of our said Sovereign Lady the Queen, her heirs and successors.

The condition of this recognizance is, that if [here insert the names of all the petitioners, and, if more than one, add, or any of them] shall well and truly pay all costs and expenses in respect of the election petition signed by him [or them] relating to them [here insert the name of the borough, city, or county, which shall become payable by the said petitioner [or petitioners] under the elections petitions act, 1848, to any witness summoned in his [or their] behalf, or to the sitting member, or other party complained of in the said petition, or to any party who may be admitted to defend the same as provided by the said act, then this recognizance to be void, otherwise to be of full force and effect.

CAP. CV.

An act to prohibit the importation of sheep, cattle, or other animals, for the purpose of preventing the introduction of contagious or infectious disorders. [4th Septem. 1848.]

Sec. 1. Power to prohibit, by order in council, the importation of sheep, cattle, &c., in order to prevent contagion.

2. Power to make, by order in council, regulations for subjecting sheep, &c. to quarantine.

3. Cattle, &c. imported contrary to provisions of orders in council to be forfeited. Penalty on importing, &c.

4. Orders in council may be revoked in whole or in part from time to time.
5. Orders in council to be published in the London Gazette.
6. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas, in order to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious disorders among sheep, cattle, horses, and other animals, be it enacted, that her Majesty, by order in council, may prohibit the importation into the United Kingdom, of cattle, sheep, horses, or other animals, either generally or from any place named in such order, for such period as she may deem to be necessary, for the purpose of preventing the introduction of any infectious or contagious disorder among the sheep, cattle, horses, or other animals in this country.

2. That her Majesty, by order in council, may make such regulations for subjecting sheep, cattle, horses, or other animals to quarantine, or for causing the same to be destroyed upon their arrival in this country, or for destroying any hay, straw, fodder, or other article whereby it appears to her that infection or contagion may be conveyed, to make such regulations with respect to the importation of sheep, cattle, horses, or other animals, as may be necessary to prevent the introduction of any contagious or infectious disorder.

3. That if any cattle, sheep, horses, or other animals be imported or attempted to be imported contrary to any order in council made in pursuance of this act, the same shall be forfeited in like manner as goods prohibited to be imported by any act relating to the customs; and all persons importing or introducing or attempting to import the same shall be liable to such penalties as are imposed on persons importing or attempting to import goods prohibited by acts relating to the customs.

4. That her Majesty, by any order in council, may revoke the whole or any part of any order issued by her Majesty in council under this act; and that from and after a day to be named in such order or orders of revocation, such order or orders issued under this act, or such part as shall be specified in such order or orders of revocation, shall cease and determine.

5. That every order in council issued under this act shall, within fourteen days after the issuing, be twice published in the London Gazette; and that a copy of every order or orders in council issued under the authority of this act shall be laid before both houses of Parliament within six weeks after issuing the same, if Parliament be then sitting, and if not, then within six weeks after the commencement of the then next session of Parliament.

6. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in the present session of Parliament.

CAP. CVL

An act to amend an act of the tenth year of her present Majesty, for rendering valid certain proceedings for the relief of distress in Ireland by employment of the labouring poor, and to indemnify those who have acted in such proceedings. [4th September, 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Copy of any award made by commissioners of public works to be sent to persons affected by same. Award to be registered.
2. Lands mentioned in the award to become chargeable, and award to be conclusive.
3. Award free of stamp duty.
4. Principal, &c. may be paid off within period fixed for repayment.
5. Upon payment of amount due lands to be released.
6. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas by an act passed in the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 10, s. 3, intitled, An act to render valid certain proceedings for the relief of distress in Ireland by employment of the labouring poor, and to indemnify those who have acted in such proceedings, it is amongst other things enacted, and it is advisable that the said act should be amended in that and other respects; be it enacted, that in all cases in which the said commissioners of public works in Ireland shall make or have already made any award under the said act of the tenth year of Her Majesty's reign, the commissioners of public works shall cause a copy of such award to be transmitted by post, or in such other manner as they shall think fit, to the proprietor or proprietors, as in the said act mentioned, of the lands which shall be the subject of such award; and the said commissioners shall execute a copy or duplicate of every such award as and for a memorial thereof for the purposes of registry, and forthwith cause such award to be registered in the office for the registry of deeds in the city of Dublin; and the registrar of the said registry office, his deputies and assistants, and other officers, shall and he and they are hereby required to register every such award in the same manner as any deed or instrument is registered in the said office, and to file, retain, and enter such duplicate or memorial in the abstract books and indexes of or relating to deeds and memorials registered and kept in the said office; and no fees whatsoever shall be payable for or in respect to such registration, anything in any former act to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. That the lands specified in every such award shall, from and after the registry thereof, become charged with the amount mentioned in such award, with interest thereon at the rate of £8 10s. per centum per annum, such interest to be calculated from the 10th of October 1847, and to be payable by half-yearly instalments on the days and times a such award mentioned; and such amount and interest shall have priority over all charges affecting the same lands; and every such award in respect of the lands therein specified shall be binding upon all persons having any estate or interest in such lands, or lien or incumbrances thereon; and every such award shall be conclusive evidence that all requisites by the said last-mentioned act and this act have been fully complied with; and it shall not be lawful for any person to question the validity of such award of the said commissioners of public works in respect of anything whatsoever done or omitted to be done, or for any other reason whatsoever.

3. That no such award or memorial thereof shall be liable to any stamp duty whatever.

4. That the proprietor for the time being of the lands specified in any such award, at any time within the period fixed by such award for repayment, may pay off in one sum the amount of principal and interest charged upon the said lands, and which may then be due and payable thereon.

5. That upon payment of the sum mentioned in such award, or such portion thereof as may from time to time be due on foot thereof, together with the interest due thereon, and also upon payment of all costs, charges, and expenses (if any) incurred in proceeding to recover the same or in relation thereto, the paymaster of civil services in Ireland for the time being shall execute a release of the lands so charged as aforesaid, at the cost and expense of the party to whom such release shall be granted.

6. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this present session of parliament.

CAP. CVIL

An act to prevent, until the 1st of September 1850, and to the end of the then session of parliament, the spreading of contagious or infectious disorders among sheep, cattle, and other animals. [4th Sep., 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Infected sheep exposed for sale may be mixed and destroyed, together with pens, hurdles, &c. Penalty on parties exposing cattle for sale, having them to be diseased.
2. Penalty on persons depasturing diseased sheep, &c.
3. Penalty on persons exposing for sale meat unfit for human food.
4. Privy Council may make Regulations as to removal of Sheep, &c.; as to purifying Yards, Stables, &c., and disposal of Animals dying in an infected state; and as to giving Notice of Appearance of Disease, &c. Penalty for offending against the same.
5. Orders, &c. to be published in Gazette, and in Country Newspapers;
6. And to be laid before Parliament.
7. Penalty for obstructing Persons in the Execution of this Act.
8. Penalties to be summarily recovered before two Justices.
9. Penalties to be levied by Distress.

10. In default of Distress, Justice may commit the Offender to Prison.
11. Distress, how to be levied.
12. Distress not unlawful for want of Form.
13. Application of Penalties. Convictions to be returned to Quarter Sessions under 3 G. 4, c. 46.
14. Penalties to be sued for within two Months after Commission of Offence.
15. Penalty on Witnesses making default.
16. Proceedings not to quashed for want of Form, nor removed by Certiorari.
17. Parties aggrieved may appeal to Quarter Sessions, on giving Security.
18. Court may make such Order as they think reasonable.
19. If suit brought on account of seizure, and the judge shall certify that there was probable cause, plaintiff to have 2d. damages, and defendant fined not more than 1s.
20. Act to continue in force for two years.
21. Act not to affect the rights, &c. of the city of London.
22. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, known or described as the sheep pox or variola ovina, now prevails among the sheep in some parts of the United Kingdom, and it is necessary to take measures to prevent such disorder from spreading: be it enacted, that in case any sheep or lambs infected with the said disorder, or any disorder of the like nature, be exposed for sale, or be brought for the purpose of being so exposed for sale, in any market, fair, or other open or public place where other animals are commonly exposed for sale, then and in any such case any clerk or inspector or other officer of such fair or market, or for any constable or policeman, or any other person authorized by the mayor, or by any two justices of the peace having jurisdiction in the place, or any person authorized or appointed by Her Majesty in council, may seize the same, and to report such seizure to the mayor or any justice of the peace having jurisdiction in the place; and such mayor or justice either to restore the same, or to cause the same, together with any pens, hurdles, troughs, litter, hay, straw, or other articles which he may judge likely to have been infected thereby, to be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as he shall deem proper, or as he may be directed in manner herein-after provided; and any person bringing or attempting to bring any sheep, lambs, oxen, bulls, cows, calves, or other horned cattle, into any such market, fair, or open or public place as aforesaid, knowing such sheep, lambs, or cattle to be infected with or labouring under either of such disorders as aforesaid, shall, upon conviction thereof, forfeit and pay for each and every such offence a sum not exceeding £30.

2. That if any person turn out, keep, or depasture any sheep or lambs infected with or labouring under the said disorder in or upon any forest, chase, wood, moor, marsh, heath, common, waste land, open field, road side, or other undivided or uninclosed land, such person shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit any sum not exceeding £20.

3. And whereas it is expedient for the preservation of the public health to make provision for preventing the sale of any meat unfit for human food: be it enacted, that if any meat unfit for human food be exposed or offered for sale in any market, fair, or other open or public place, such clerk, inspectors, constables, policemen, or other persons authorized as aforesaid may seize the same, and report such seizure to such mayor or justice as aforesaid; and such mayor or justice may either order the same to be restored, or to be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as aforesaid; and any person publicly exposing or offering such meat for sale shall, upon conviction, forfeit and pay for each and every such offence a sum not exceeding £20.

4. And for effectually preventing the spreading of contagious or infectious disease, be it enacted, that the lords of Her Majesty's privy council, or any two or more of them, from time to time may make such orders and regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal, to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such order or orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection; and also for the purpose of purifying any yard, stable, outhouse, or other place, or any waggons, carts, carriages, or other vehicles; and also for the purpose of directing how any animals dying in a diseased state, or any animals, parts of animals, or other things seized under the provisions of this act, are to be disposed of; and also for the purpose of causing notices to be given of the appearance of any disorder among sheep, cattle, or other animals, and to make any other orders or regulations for the purpose of giving effect to this act, and again to revoke, alter, or vary any such orders or regulations; and all provisions for any of the purposes aforesaid in any such order or orders contained shall have the like force and effect as if the same had been inserted in this act; and all persons offending against the same shall for each and every offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding £20, or such smaller sum as the said lords or others of Her Majesty's privy council may in any case by such order direct.

5. That all orders and regulations made under this act shall, within fourteen days after the issuing thereof, be twice published in the London Gazette; and in case such orders or regulations apply to any particular places or districts, then the same shall also be twice published, within fourteen days as aforesaid, in some newspaper or newspapers circulating in the county or counties within which each of such places or districts, or any part or parts thereof respectively, is or are situated.

6. That a copy of every such order or orders shall be laid before both houses of parliament within six weeks after issuing the same, if parliament be then sitting, and if parliament be not then sitting, then within six weeks after the commencement of the then next session of parliament.

7. That in case any person wilfully obstruct or impede any person acting under the authority of this act, or of any order or regulation made in pursuance of this act, every person so offending, and all others aiding and assisting therein, shall and may be seized and detained by such person so acting under this act, or any person or persons he may call to his assistance, until such offender or offenders can be conveniently taken before some justice of the peace having jurisdiction in the county or place wherein such offence shall be committed, and when convicted before such justice (who is hereby authorized and required, upon complaint to him upon oath, to take cognizance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises,) shall, in the discretion of such justice, forfeit any sum not exceeding £5, and in default of payment thereof shall and may be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two calendar months, unless the amount of the penalty shall have been sooner discharged.

8. That every penalty or forfeiture imposed by this act may be recovered by summary proceeding before two justices; and upon the exhibition of any information in writing before any justice such justice shall issue a summons requiring the party complained against to appear before two justices, at a time and place to be named in such summons, and every such summons shall be served on the party offending, either in person or by leaving the same with some inmate, at his last or usual place of abode; and upon the appearance of the party complained against, or in his absence, after proof of the service of such summons, any two justices having jurisdiction may proceed to the hearing of the complaint; and upon proof of the offence, either by the confession of the party complained against or upon the oath of one credible witness or more, such justices may convict the offender, and upon such conviction to adjudge the offender to pay such penalty as may seem fit, and not greater than the penalty or forfeiture specified in this act, as well as such costs attending the conviction as such justices shall think fit.

9. That if forthwith upon any such adjudication as aforesaid the amount of the penalty or forfeiture, and of such costs as aforesaid, be not paid, the amount of such penalty and costs shall be levied by distress, and such justices, or either of them, or any other justice having jurisdiction as aforesaid, shall issue their or his warrant of distress accordingly.

10. That such justice may order any offender so convicted as aforesaid to be detained and kept in safe custody until return can be conveniently made to the warrant of distress to be issued for levying such penalty or forfeiture and costs, unless the offender give sufficient security, by way of recognizance or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the justice, for his appearance before him on the day appointed for such return, such day being not more than eight days from the time of taking such security; but if before issuing such warrant of distress it shall appear to the justice, by the admission of the offender or otherwise, that no sufficient distress can be had within the jurisdiction of such justice whereon to levy such penalty or forfeiture and costs, he may, if he think fit, refrain from issuing such warrant of distress; and in such case, or if such warrant shall have been issued, and upon the return thereof such insufficiency as aforesaid shall be made to appear to the justice, then such justice shall by warrant cause such offender to be committed to gaol, there to remain without bail for any term not exceeding three months, unless such penalty or forfeiture and costs be sooner paid and satisfied.

11. That where in this act any sum of money, whether in the nature of penalty or otherwise, is directed to be levied by distress, such sum of money shall be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the party liable to pay the same; and the overplus arising from the sale of such goods and chattels, after satisfying such sum of money, and the expenses of the distress and sale, shall be returned, on demand, to the party whose goods shall have been distrained.

12. That no distress levied by virtue of this act shall be deemed unlawful, nor shall any party making the same be deemed a trespasser, on account of any defect or want of form in the summons, conviction, warrant of distress, or other proceedings relating thereto, nor shall such party be deemed a trespasser ab initio on account of any irregularity afterwards committed by him, but all persons aggrieved by such defect or irregularity may recover full satisfaction for the special damage in an action upon the case.

13. That all penalties and forfeitures recovered under this act shall be applied as follows: one half thereof shall be paid to the person who shall sue or proceed for the same, and the other half to Her Majesty's use, and shall be paid to the sheriffs of the county, city, or town where the same shall have been imposed, and shall have been duly accounted for by him; and that all convictions before justices, and all fines, forfeitures, or penalties imposed in consequence of such convictions, shall be returned to the court of Quarter Sessions, under the provisions of the 3 Geo. 4 c. 46.

14. That no person shall be liable to the payment of any penalty or forfeiture imposed by virtue of this act for any offence made cognizable before a justice, unless the complaint respecting such offence shall have been made before such justice within two months next after the commission of such offence.

15. That any justice may summon any person to appear before him as a witness in any matter in which such justice shall have jurisdiction under this act, at a time and place mentioned in such summons, and to administer to him an oath to testify the truth; and if any person so summoned shall without reasonable excuse refuse or neglect to appear at the time and place appointed for that purpose, having been paid or tendered a reasonable sum for his expenses, or if any person appearing shall refuse to be examined on oath, or to give evidence before such justice, every such person shall forfeit a sum not exceeding £5 for every such offence.

16. That no warrant of commitment consequent upon any conviction under this act shall be held void by reason of any defect in such warrant, provided it be therein alleged that the party has been convicted, and there be a good and valid conviction to sustain the same; nor shall any conviction, order, or other proceeding in pursuance of this act be quashed or vacated for want of form, nor shall the same be removed by certiorari or otherwise into any of the superior courts.

17. That if any person shall think himself aggrieved by any determination or adjudication of any justice with respect to any penalty or forfeiture under the provisions of this act, he may appeal to the general Quarter Sessions for the county or place in which the cause of appeal shall have arisen, but no such appeal shall be entertained unless it be made within four months next after the making of such determination or adjudication, nor unless ten days notice in writing of such appeal, stating the nature and grounds thereof, be given to the party against whom the appeal shall be brought, nor unless the appellant forthwith after such notice enter into recognizances, with two sufficient sureties, before a justice, conditioned duly to prosecute such appeal, and to abide the order of the court thereon.

Sir,
"I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it made of those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has no advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture; it is susceptible of a very high polish, it does not soil, and its permanent effect on the leather is of a beneficial character."

DUBLIN, MAY 26, 1849.

AMONGST the contemplated measures of the Session, we have to enumerate one for the consolidation and amendment of the laws relating to Attorneys and Solicitors in Ireland. The design of the measure is to remove some manifest defects, but its language is sometimes obscure, and its enactments not sufficiently distinct or methodized.

It proposes to make all costs, whether for business done in Court or otherwise, taxable; at least, we conclude this to be the design, from the following part of the second section:—"And upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill within such month—(month after service)—it shall be lawful, in case the business contained in such bill or any part thereof shall have been transacted in the High Court of Chancery, or in any other Court of Equity, or in any matter of bankruptcy or lunacy, or in case no part of such business shall have been transacted in any Court of Law or Equity, for the Lord High Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls, and in case any part of such business shall have been transacted in any other Court, for the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, or any Judge of either (quere: sic in orig.) of them, and they are hereby respectively required to refer such bill, and the demand of such attorney or solicitor, executor, administrator, or assignee, thereupon to be taxed and settled by the proper officer of the Court in which such reference shall be made, without any money being brought into Court."

This clause comprehends various classes of business; business transacted in a Court of Equity, either altogether or together with business done in a Court of Law, or business hitherto not taxable; business not transacted in any Court, and business transacted exclusively or in part in a Court of Law. In the arrangement of the sentences, although we understand the meaning to be, that the Courts of Common Law are to have power to refer, when the "whole business" is transacted at common law. The bill in terms only applies to cases where there is "any part" of such business so transacted. But the intention is, that in cases where the costs are wholly legal, or are partly legal and partly equitable, or partly legal and partly for business done out of Court, and in all cases of business done in their own Courts, as the Equity Exchequer; Courts of law will have the power to refer, and in all other cases the Court of Chancery.

Independently of rendering every description of business taxable, no submission of the applicant for taxation, to pay the sum that shall be found due upon such taxation, is required; but by the eighth section payment of the amount may be enforced according to the course of the Court in which such reference shall be made, and a Court of Common Law may order judgment to be entered up for such amount with costs, unless the retainer shall have been disputed previous to the commencement of the taxation. We apprehend, no application for taxation would be made where the retainer was disputed: nor should a reference be permitted, if the relation of attorney and client were matter of controversy.

It is proposed to allow service of the bill either by delivery, as at present, or by sending it through the post, or leaving it at the counting house, client's office of business, dwelling-house, or last known place of abode. We think, in matters of this sort, this postal latitude of service unwise. In proper cases, the Court will substitute service, but legislative laxity on this point is injudicious. The necessity for furnishing the bill is very properly extended to all cases whether by the attorney himself or his representatives. Under the existing law the attorney was required to deliver his bill a month before the commencement of the action, but, singularly enough, it was held, on the construction of the previous statute, to be unnecessary for his executor or administrator to do so, thus, in all such cases, frustrating the intention of the legislature, to give the client a reasonable time to consider whether the demand were fair or exorbitant.

No reference for taxation is to be made after verdict or writ of inquiry, nor after the expiration of twelve months after the bill has been delivered or sent, except under special circumstances.

The want of summary jurisdiction of courts of law and equity over the representatives of attorneys in cases where such representatives had possession of the client's deeds, occasioned much inconvenience and sometimes gave rise to much extortion; the present measure contains the following proviso:—"That it shall be lawful for the said respective Courts and Judges, in the same cases in which they are respectively authorized to refer a bill, to make such order for the delivery by any attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of any attorney or solicitor, of such bill as aforesaid, and for the delivery up of deeds, documents, or papers in his possession, custody, or power, or otherwise touching the same, in the same manner as has heretofore been done, as regards such attorney or solicitor, by such Courts or Judges respectively, where any such business had been transacted in the Court in which such order had been made."

This proviso would appear to relate to cases between Solicitor and Client merely; but the evil is not confined to such cases. Thus, in Roberts v. Prior, (not yet reported,) the mortgagees had not obtained possession of the title-deeds; the mortgagor had, subsequently to the mortgage, given them to the solicitor. In a foreclosure suit by the mortgagees, a final decree for sale had been obtained. For the purpose of making out title, an application was made against the representative of the solicitor for the deeds, without prejudice to any lien he might be enabled to establish on the funds to be realized by the sale. It was plain, that against the mortgagees the solicitor or his representative had no lien, and also plain, that, as against the solicitor himself the Court would have complete jurisdiction to enforce the production of the deeds, but the Master of the Rolls held he had no summary jurisdiction against the personal representative, and it had been previously so held in England; although, independently of authority, it would have appeared to us that every representative or assignee of an attorney would be subject to all the equities to which the attorney himself would have been liable; and in the case of the assignee of Mills v. Lester, (Hayes, 201,) the Court of Exchequer exercised summary jurisdiction over the assignee of an insolvent attorney, who had unwarrantably obtained possession of papers belonging to the testator of the defendant. There was this distinction between the authority we have cited and the class of cases to which we refer,—that the question arose between the representative of the client and the assignee of the attorney, whilst in Roberts v. Prior and similar cases, which are not of unfrequent occurrence, no relation of attorney and client has subsisted. But that distinction is not the ground of decision, the point being the absence, or the contrary, of summary jurisdiction.

If there be any doubt on the question it would be well to remove it by making the proviso we have cited more explicit and comprehensive.

In the course of our observations we guard ourselves from the expression of any censure upon the introducers of the proposed bill, as deserved either by its language or design, the former being taken ipsisimis verbis from the English act of 1843, 6 & 7 Vic. c. 73; the only matter of blame that could attach would be—the following too exactly that measure. No one who has witnessed or suffered from the charges of solicitors in matters not taxable, but must rejoice at the prospect of protection from demands, whose exorbitancy, as in cases of loans, was ill-proportioned to the need of the client. The respectable practitioner never dreads scrutiny, and the knavish one always requires it.

In the recent case of Delany v. Newland, (1 Ir. Jur. 238,) a principle has been laid down by the Court of Exchequer, in an elaborate judgment by the Lord Chief Baron, in which he reviewed all the authorities, that in every case where a bill is shown to be tainted with fraud, the onus is thrown upon the holder of proving that he has given value.

This decision will, we trust—at least, in this country—settle a question which the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench in England, and that of Howard v. Shaw, (9 Ir. L. Rep. 335,) in Ireland, had left unsettled. The view taken by Mr. Baron Parke, in Bailey v. Bidwell, (13 M. & W. 76,) that "the taint of fraud or illegality afforded a presumption that the person who had been guilty of the illegality would dispose of it, and would place it in the hands of another person to sue upon it," is so perfectly consonant with the ordinary facts in such cases, and those which actually existed in the principal case, as to leave no doubt upon any mind of the correctness of the conclusion of that learned Judge. And such a taint being once thrown upon the holder's title, the propriety of compelling him to prove that which, if true, he can have no difficulty in doing, the whole transaction being peculiarly within his own knowledge, is clearly preferable to that of throwing upon the defendant the onus of proving the absence of any consideration flowing from the holder—a proof which, from the very nature of the thing, is in every stage beset with difficulties, and is probably, in nine cases out of ten, incapable of proof by the defendant.

The only case which created a serious difficulty in the way of the conclusion arrived at by the Court, was that of Howard v. Shaw, a case which received much consideration at the bar and on the bench. The decision in the principal case, however, virtually over-rules that of Howard v. Shaw, so far as this question is involved, the Court being of opinion that the point did not properly arise in Howard v. Shaw, as in that case there was an adequate consideration for the notes, (See judgment, p. 351,) and because the case of Bailey v. Bidwell had not been cited to the Court. It is also observable, that the cases referred to and relied upon in the judgment of the Court in Howard v. Shaw, as supporting their view, the one Smith v. Martin, (9 M. & W. 304,) in the Court of Exchequer—the other, Bramah v. Roberts, (1 Scott, 350,) in the Queen's Bench, were both referable to the particular pleadings before the Courts. In the former, the defendant pleaded fraud—the plaintiff, that he had no knowledge of it when he took the note; the issue then was, as to the knowledge of the fraud, not whether there was any. p. 307, Alderson, B., says, in answer to an argument at the bar, "Assuming that the circumstances of fraud alleged in the plea are admitted as facts by the replication, how do they afford prima facie evidence of the plaintiff's knowledge of that fraud. When a plea states facts amounting to fraud, and alleges that the plaintiff had knowledge of them, the issue, according to your argument, is on the plaintiff; then, suppose he proves consideration, which way ought the verdict to be? His having given consideration, proves nothing conclusively as to his want of knowledge of the fraud." In the latter case, the question arose on a demurrer to the replication, which denied the fraud, and stated generally that the plaintiffs had given consideration—i. e. "for moneys advanced by and due and owing to them"—a state of pleading which did not fairly raise the question for which it was relied upon as an authority. In answer to the fraud alleged in the plea, the plaintiff replied, "I have given consideration;"—which, if proved, would in any case be a sufficient answer to the allegation of fraud, unless he was without notice of it. The only question for the Court was, whether he should not have gone further, and set out that consideration more fully, which they thought he was not bound to do.

ABSTRACT OF A BILL FURTHER TO FACILITATE THE SALE OF INCUMBERED ESTATES IN IRELAND.*

Note—The words printed in Italics are proposed to be inserted in committee.

SEC. I. Whereas it is expedient that further facilities should be given for the sale of incumbered estates in Ireland, be it enacted, &c., that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by warrant under the royal sign manual to appoint any number of persons not exceeding three to be commissioners under this act during Her Majesty's pleasure and upon every vacancy to appoint some other person to such office to be styled "the commissioners for sale of incumbered estates in Ireland."

II. That the commissioners shall have a seal, and shall cause to be sealed therewith all orders, conveyances, &c. under this act and such orders, &c., or copies thereof purporting to be sealed with the seal of the commissioners, shall be received in evidence without any further proof thereof.

III. All acts, &c., authorized to be done by the commissioners under this act may be done by any two of such commissioners.

IV. The commissioners, with the consent in every case of the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, may appoint a secretary and such clerks, messengers and officers as they shall deem necessary, and may remove same.

V. That no commissioner, secretary or other officer shall hold office for more than five years from the passing of this act, and thenceforth until the end of the then next session of parliament.

VI. That the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury may direct a salary, not exceeding £—, to be paid to the commissioners under this act, and may regulate the salaries of the secretary and other officers under this act, and same, and other expenses of carrying this act into execution, shall be paid out of monies to be provided by parliament.

VII. No commissioner shall, during the continuance of his office, be elected for or sit as a member of the House of Commons.

VIII. Before entering on the execution of his office every commissioner shall take the following oath: "I, A. B., do swear that I will faithfully, impartially, and honestly, according to the best of my skill and judgment, fulfil all the powers and duties of a commissioner under an act, passed in the — year of the reign of Queen Victoria, intituled &c." And the appointment of every such commissioner, with the time when, and the name of the justice or baron before whom he shall have taken said oath, shall be forthwith published in the Dublin Gazette.

IX. The commissioners shall frame and cause to be printed and circulated, as they shall see occasion, forms of applications and directions, indicating the particulars of the information to be furnished to the commissioners on applications to them under this act, with reference to title, incumbrances, and the circumstances of the land, and such other information as, in the judgment of the commissioners, may assist them in forming an opinion on such application, and also such other forms and directions as they may deem requisite.

X. The commissioners shall, from time to time, make such general rules for regulating the course of procedure under this act, and securing the due and prompt distribution of the moneys received upon sales, amongst or for the benefit of the persons entitled thereto, and for the protection of the interests of persons under disability and of future interests, and for giving effect to this act; but no fees or sums shall, under any general rule or otherwise, be payable to any officer or person appointed under this act in respect of any proceeding under this act, save in respect of any copy or extract of any order, &c., such sum not exceeding three half pence for every 100 words, as shall be paid for the making of such copy, &c., and every such general rule shall be laid before her Majesty's Privy Council of Ireland, and by order signed by six of said Privy Council, said Privy Council may confirm or disallow any such rule, or alter, amend, or remit same to the commissioners for further consideration, and (when confirmed) every such general rule shall be enrolled in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and when so enrolled shall be binding on the commissioners, and shall be of the same force as if enacted by the authority of parliament: provided that same may be amended, remanded, or altered by other rules, confirmed and enrolled in like manner.

XI. All such general rules made and confirmed as aforesaid shall be laid before both houses of parliament within one month from the confirmation thereof, or if parliament be not then sitting, within one month from the commencement of the next session.

XII. It shall be lawful for the commissioners, by summons under their seal, to require the attendance at a time and place to be mentioned in such summons of all persons they shall think fit to examine in relation to any matter before them, and require such persons to produce all deeds, &c. relating thereto, and examine such persons on oath or affirmation; and every person summoned to attend shall fail to appear, or refuse to be sworn, or shall not answer all lawful questions, or fail or refuse to produce any such deeds, &c. in his custody, possession or power, shall be liable to the same penalties &c. as any person failing to appear or refusing to give evidence in any suit or matter in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and the commissioners shall have the like powers, &c. for enforcing the attendance of persons summoned, for punishing persons failing to appear or refusing to be sworn, &c. and for enforcing all orders made by them under this act as are vested in the said Court of Chancery in relation to any suit or matter depending therein.

XIII. The commissioners may receive in evidence affidavits, and same may be made before commissioners of the Court of Chancery, or the commissioners under this act may appoint persons to take same, and to examine witnesses.

XIV. Orders made by the commissioners may be enrolled in the Court of Chancery in England, and may be enforced in the same manner as orders under the 41 Geo. 3, c. 90.

XV. The commissioners shall have all the powers and authority of a court of Equity in Ireland for the investigation of title, and for ascertaining and allowing incumbrances, and charges, and the amount due thereon, and settling the priority of same, and the rights of owners and others, and generally for ascertaining, declaring and allowing the rights of all persons in any land or lease, in respect of which any application may be made under this act, or in the money to arise from sales under this act, but their procedure shall be according to such general rules as aforesaid, or, where same shall be inapplicable, at the discretion of the commissioners, and the commissioners may send cases for the opinion of a court of Law, and direct issues of fact to be tried by a jury, and, subject to any such general rule, the commissioners may refer to any one of such commissioners any such inquiries or matters as they may think fit, and such commissioner shall have, in relation thereto, the like powers vested in any two commissioners under this act.

XVI. The owner of any incumbrance upon land in Ireland, or any lease in perpetuity, or any lease for a time whereof not less than sixty years shall be unexpired, subject to incumbrance, may, within three years from the passing of this act, apply to the commissioners for a sale under this act.

XVII. For the purposes of this act land shall not be deemed subject to an incumbrance unless same shall affect a term of not less than fifty years absolute, unexpired, or a greater estate on such land, nor unless such incumbrance shall have been created by the owner of an estate of inheritance, but an incumbrance charged under a power created by an owner of an estate of inheritance shall be deemed to have been created by such owner, and such lease as aforesaid shall not be deemed subject to incumbrance where same shall affect a derivative estate or interest only, or less than the whole estate created by such lease, unless such incumbrance shall have been created by the owner of or persons entitled to the whole estate created by such lease, but any incumbrance charged under a power created by the owner or person entitled to such whole estate, shall be deemed created by such owner or person entitled.

XVIII. When any incumbrances shall be subject to any limitation, or be held on trust, the commissioners may proceed, upon the application or consent of the first person entitled to the income of such incumbrance, or of any trustee thereof, or other person whose estate or interest in the incumbrance appears to the commissioners sufficient to enable him properly to apply or consent in respect of the interests of the parties interested in the incumbrance.

XIX. The commissioners shall direct notice to be given to any person in such manner as they shall think fit, and hear any parties interested in the land or lease who may apply to them, and may investigate the title and incumbrances affecting same, and the state and circumstances of the land or lease, so far only as may be necessary to determine whether, under all the circumstances, it is expedient that a sale of all or any part should be made, and may, at their discretion, make an order for sale of all or any part thereof.

XX. Where a sale shall be made, the commissioners shall ascertain the tenancies of occupying tenants, and any lessees or under-lessees, subject to whose tenancies, leases or under-leases the owner or incumbrancer, applying to the commissioners under this act, may be owner or incumbrancer, and may give such notice and make such inquiries as may be necessary to secure the rights of such tenants, lessees, or under-lessees, and the sale shall be made subject to the tenancies, leases or under-leases so ascertained, and when the commissioners think fit, such sale may be made, subject to any annual charge, or such apportioned part as the commissioners think fit should remain charged thereon.

XXI. Where the commissioners make an order for sale, the land or lease shall be sold under the control of the commissioners by public sale or private contract together or in lots, and at such time and place as the commissioners think fit, and the conveyances, &c. shall be made by the commissioners, and the execution by any other party shall be unnecessary, and such conveyance shall refer to the tenancies, leases or under-leases (if any), and the charges (if any), subject to which the sale is made, and may be in the form in the schedule of this act contained, or to the like effect, with such limitations of uses and other additions, &c. as, with the approval of the commissioners, the purchaser may direct.

XXII. The purchase-money, in every case, shall be paid into the Bank of Ireland to an account in the name of the commissioners, and to the credit of the estate sold, or, as the commissioners by general rule or special order, shall direct, and on the notification by the bank to the commissioners of the receipt of the money, a certificate, under the seal of the commissioners, of such receipt shall be endorsed on or written at foot of the conveyance, and on such payment into bank the purchaser shall be discharged from all liability as to the application of the purchase-money, and the certificate of the commissioners shall be evidence of payment.

XXIII. Every such conveyance upon the sale of land shall be effectual to pass the fee-simple and inheritance of the land subject to such tenancies, leases, and under-leases referred to therein as aforesaid, but save, as hereafter provided, discharged from all former and other estates, rights, titles, charges, and incumbrances whatsoever, of her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and all other persons whomsoever; and every such conveyance upon the sale of a lease shall pass the estate created or agreed to be created thereby, and remaining unexpired, subject to the rent and covenants annexed to the reversion, and to such tenancies, leases, and under-leases as are referred to in such conveyance, but save as aforesaid, and as hereafter provided, discharged from all rights, titles, charges, &c., affecting same; where any land or lease is sold, subject to any annual charge or apportioned part thereof, same shall remain payable out of such land or lease as in the conveyance, &c., shall be expressed.

XXIV. Such conveyance shall not affect any right of common or way, or other easement or rent-charge in lieu of tithes, crown or quit-rent, or charge under the drainage act, 5 & 6 Vic. c. 89, or the act amending same, 10 & 11 Vic. c. 32.

XXV. The commissioners shall have power to order the delivery to the purchaser of all leases, &c., and shall, on the application of the purchaser, issue an order to the sheriff to put such purchaser in possession of all lands not in the occupation of lessees, &c., subject to whose leases the sale shall be made, and who shall have attorned to such purchaser within a time limited by such order, and same shall be executed in like manner as a writ for the delivery of possession.

XXVI. The commissioners shall, out of the purchase money received on the sale of any land or lease under this act, pay the costs of and consequential on the application for the order for the sale, as they shall think fit, and the expenses of and incidental to the sale, and the surplus shall, after payment of such costs, &c., under the order of the commissioners, be applied in or towards payment or satisfaction of the incumbrances or charges which affected such land or lease, or part thereof, according to their priorities, and shall, subject as aforesaid, be paid to the owner, previously to such sale of such land or lease, where such owner was absolutely entitled thereto, or where not so entitled, be laid out in the purchase of land, which shall be limited and settled to the same uses, upon the same trusts, for the same purposes, and in the same manner, as the land or lease, or part sold, or such of them as shall be then subsisting or capable of taking effect; and until such money can be so laid out, it may, under such order as aforesaid, be transferred or paid over to trustees, to be appointed or approved by the commissioners, for the purpose of being so laid out as aforesaid, with such power for the investment thereof in Government Stock funds or securities in the meantime, and such directions for the payment of the income of such investment in the manner in which the rents of the land to be purchased would be applicable, as the commissioners shall think fit.

XXVII. That any money so paid into bank may by order of the commissioners be invested in their name in the purchase of any stock, &c., and the dividends applied under the order of the commissioners, as the rent of the land or lease from the sale whereof the money invested has arisen, would have been applicable.

XXVIII. Whenever the commissioners direct the appointment of trustees, they may make provision for the appointment of new trustees.

XXIX. Provided that no payment towards the discharge of any incumbrance or charge, not being a payment in full, shall prejudice or affect any right or remedy of the incumbrancer, or the person entitled to the charge in respect of the balance, otherwise than as against the land or lease or part thereof sold, and no payment under this act, of or in respect of any incumbrance or charge, shall impair any right or equity of any person out of whose estate such payment shall be made, to be reimbursed or indemnified by any person, or out of any other land or estate, except so far as the commissioners under any special circumstances shall order.

XXX. That the commissioners may pay to any person entitled to any charge, not being an incumbrancer under this act, who may consent to accept same, a gross sum in discharge, or by way of redemption thereof or of a part thereof; and where part only of the land or lease is sold, may, with the consent of the incumbrancer or person entitled to the charge, charge the part not sold with such incumbrance or charge, or an apportioned part thereof, in exoneration of the money arising from the sale, and may authorize persons to release the money from any incumbrance, or relinquish their claim on such money in respect thereof, without impairing or affecting such incumbrance or charge, as to the remaining part of the land or lease originally charged, and the commissioners may invest money to meet any annual charge, where by reason of same being contingent or otherwise it shall seem proper so to do, and otherwise may make such orders for applying the money as will secure the convenient application thereof for the benefit and according to the rights of the parties interested in the land or lease or part thereof from the sale of which the same shall have arisen.

XXXI. Where any money arising from a sale is not immediately distributable, or the parties entitled thereto cannot be ascertained, or where the commissioners think it expedient, they may order such money or the securities in which same may be invested, to be transferred to the account of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery or Exchequer in Ireland, or the Court of Chancery in England, in the matter of the parties interested in trust to attend the order of such Court, and may declare the trusts affecting same so far as ascertained by them, or the facts found by them in relation thereto; and the Court of Chancery, Chancellor, and Master of the Rolls in England and Ireland respectively, and the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, may make such order in relation to such money, &c., so transferred, as they may think fit in relation to any funds, &c., paid or deposited under the 10 & 11 Vic. c. 96, being the act for the relief of trustees, or the 11 & 12 Ric. c. 68, for extending said act to Ireland; and such money shall not be liable to usher's poundage.

XXXII. Where any lease subject to incumbrance shall be sold, the commissioners may, at the application of the owner of the reversion, include in this sale the reversion, upon such terms as they shall see fit, and shall apportion the purchase-money and expenses, and the assurance shall include the reversion, if the commissioner's think fit.

XXXIII. If any land or lease to be sold shall be subject to any lease or under-lease for years, lives comprising other land at an entire rent, the commissioners may apportion the rent between the land to be sold and the remainder; and where it is intended to sell part only of any lease, the commissioners may apportion the rent between the land to be sold and the remainder, and the commissioners shall direct notices to be given of any such intended apportionment to such persons as they think fit, and may hear parties in relation thereto; and after such apportionment and sale, the owners of the reversion shall have the like remedies for the apportioned rents against the lands out of which same shall be payable, and the owners and occupiers thereof as were subsisting for the entire rent before such apportionment, and all the covenants, conditions, and agreements of every lease or under-lease, except as to the amount of rent to be paid, shall as regards the apportioned parts remain in force in the same manner as if no apportionment had taken place.

XXXIV. Where any person who, if not under disability, might have applied, consented, or done any act, or been party to any proceeding under this act, shall be a minor, idiot, lunatic, or married woman, the guardian, committee of the estate, and husband respectively of such person may apply, consent, do such act, or be party to such proceedings as such person might have done, and shall otherwise represent such person for the purposes of this act; but a married woman entitled for her separate use, (with or without power of anticipation,) shall for the purposes of this act be deemed a feme sole, and where there shall be no guardian or committee of the estate of any idiot or lunatic, or where any person of unsound mind shall not have been found idiot or lunatic under an inquisition, the commissioners may appoint a guardian for the purposes of this act, and may change such guardians, and the commissioners may appoint a next friend of any married woman, and may change such next friend.

XXXV. Proceedings under this act shall not abate or be suspended by deaths, transmissions, or change of interest. But in such case the commissioners may, where they see fit, require notices to be given to parties becoming interested, or make any order for discontinuing, suspending, or carrying on the proceedings, as may appear just.

XXXVI. In every proceeding under this act, the commissioners shall have full power and discretion as to the giving and withholding costs and expenses, and as to the person by whom, and the funds out of which the same shall, in the first instance or ultimately, be paid, repaid, and borne, and may apportion same amongst such parties, and in respect of interest, rents, or income, and principal or corpus, as they shall see fit.

XXXVII. Application may be made for a sale, and an order made by the commissioners, notwithstanding any pending proceeding in a Court of Equity in England or Ireland, or any decree of such Court already made for a sale; and where it shall be shown to the commissioners that a decree for a sale has been made by a Court of Equity, the Commissioners shall, if they see fit, without further inquiry, order a sale of the land or lease decreed to be sold, and where any sale shall be made of land or lease, in respect of which there shall have been a decree, or any proceedings pending in a Court of Equity, in distributing the money and in their other proceedings, the commissioners shall have regard to the proceedings in such Court in relation to the priorities and rights of incumbrances and others; and where a decree has been pronounced, the commissioners may proceed upon and be guided by the declaration of and the inquiries and proofs made and taken under such decree in relation to such priorities and rights as aforesaid, and the commissioners shall, out of the money arising from any sale under this act, where there shall have been any such decrees or pending proceeding, make such provision for payment of costs incurred in Equity as circumstances may require, or they may order all or any part of the purchase-money, after payment of the costs and expenses payable under the orders of the commissioners, to be paid into the Court of Equity in or under any suit or decree then pending or made.

XXXVIII. When the commissioners shall order the sale of any land or lease or part thereof, in respect of which a decree shall have been made by a Court of Equity for a sale, or any proceeding shall have been pending, they shall by certificate under their seal notify to such Court the order, &c., made by them, and all proceedings for or in relation to a sale under the decree of such Court shall be stayed, and upon the completion of the sale under such order of the commissioners, any receiver appointed by such Court shall cease to act, with respect to the land or lease or part sold, and the Court may suspend or stay any other proceedings in such court, in or under any order or decree already made by such Court as the Court shall think fit, and pending any proceedings for a sale under this act, it shall not be lawful for any owner, or any person claiming to be owner within the meaning of this act, or claiming by the act of such owner or person, or by act of law, or any incumbrancer, to commence any proceedings at law or in Equity for redemption, foreclosure, or sale, or to commence, take, continue, or prosecute any proceeding whatsoever under the act of the last session, "to facilitate the sale of incumbered estates in Ireland," without leave of the commissioners.

XXXIX. The commissioners shall not be subject to be restrained in the execution of their powers under this act, nor shall any person be restrained from making application under this act to the commissioners, or doing any other act, or giving any consent under this act, by order or injunction of a Court of Equity; nor shall proceedings before the commissioners be removeable by certiorari.

XL. The commissioners may renew, rescind, or vary any order made by them, but save as aforesaid, and as hereafter provided, every order shall be final, provided that where the commissioners allow appeal, but not otherwise, appeal against any order may be made to the Privy Council of Ireland, within one calendar month from the making of the order appealed against, and such appeal shall be heard and reported on by members of the Privy Council, to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor of Ireland, to be a judicial committee for that purpose, and the order of the Privy Council shall be made according to the report of such judicial committee, and shall be final.

XLI. Any person examined before the commissioners, or the persons authorized by them, who shall give false evidence, shall be guilty of perjury.

XLII. In the construction of this act the word "land" shall extend to manors, advowsons, rectories, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, and hereditaments of any tenure, whether subject to any fee-farm or other perpetual rent, with or without condition of re-entry for securing the same or otherwise, or whether corporeal or incorporeal, and every undivided share thereof. And the word "estate" shall extend to any estate in Equity as well as at Law, and to the benefit of any covenant or contract for, or right of renewal. And the word "lease" shall include an agreement for a lease, and the estate or interest created or agreed to be created by such lease or agreement in the whole or any part of the land therein comprised; and "lease in perpetuity" shall mean any lease or grant for one or more life or lives, with or without a term of years, or for years determinable on one or more life or lives, or for years absolute with a consent or agreement in any of such cases, whether in the same or in any other instrument, for the perpetual renewal of such lease or grant, whether such lease shall be derived out of the inheritance or by way of under-lease out of any lease or other estate. And the word "incumbrance" shall mean any legal or equitable mortgage in fee or for any less estate, and also any money secured by a trust, or by judgment, decree or order of any superior court of Law or Equity duly registered, and any legacy, portion, lien, or other charge whereby a gross sum of money is secured to be paid on an event or at a time certain, and also any annual or periodical charge, which, by the instrument creating same or by any other instrument, is made repurchaseable on payment of a gross sum of money, and also any arrear remaining unpaid of any annual or periodical charge for payment of which a sale might be decreed by a court of Equity. And the word "incumbrancer" shall mean any person entitled to such incumbrance, or entitled to require payment or discharge thereof. And the word "possession" shall include the receipt of the rents and profits. And the word "owner," as applied to any land, shall include any person entitled in possession, in fee simple, or in tail, or quasi in tail, and any person entitled in possession for a life or lives, or for a term of years determinable on the dropping of any life or lives, or for a term of years of which not less than 99 years are unexpired, not being a lessee at a rent, and also any person entitled in possession as tenant by the curtesy whether at Law or in Equity, and any person entitled in possession whether in fee, or any lesser estate as aforesaid to the Equity of redemption in any land, or to the land subject to any incumbrance, or a trust for the payment of any incumbrance, and any feoffees or trustees for charitable or other purposes entitled in possession; and the word "owner," as applied to a lease in perpetuity or other lease, shall include any person entitled in possession to the land comprised in such lease for the whole estate created or agreed to be created by such lease, or for any derivative estate (created by settlement on testamentary or other disposition thereof) quasi in tail, for life or lives, or for years, of which not less than 50 years are unexpired, not being an under-lease at a rent derived out of such lease, and any person entitled in possession for such whole estate or such derivative estate as aforesaid to the Equity of redemption in such lease or to such lease subject to any incumbrance on a trust for the payment of any incumbrance; and the words "person" and "owner" shall extend to bodies politic and corporate as well as individuals; and "commissioners" shall mean "The Commissioners for Sale of Incumbered Estates in Ireland;" and "Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury" shall mean such commissioners for the time being, or any three of them, or the said Lord High Treasurer for the time being; and every word in the singular number shall extend to several persons and things, and the plural shall apply to one person or thing, and the masculine gender shall extend to a female.

XLIII. This act, save so far as the several provisions require, shall only extend to Ireland.

DUBLIN, JUNE 2, 1849.

We give elsewhere the opinion of the English judges on the errors assigned in the case of William Smith O'Brien, and others v. the Queen, and the judgment of the House of Lords in conformity with that opinion.

There was no decision on the substantial question raised by the prisoners, as to whether the 11 & 12 Vic. extended to Ireland in certain cases of treason, the privileges which persons accused of that crime are entitled to in England, and whether the denial of those privileges was the subject-matter of a declinatory plea, the case having been decided, as will be seen on reference to the report, on the ground, that, as the treason, the subject of the sixth count of the indictment, did not come within the provisions of the 11 & 12 Vic.—the Treason Felony Act—which extended to Ireland certain of the provisions of the English Act, 36 Geo. 3, made perpetual by the 57 Geo. 3, it became unnecessary to consider whether the plaintiffs in error were entitled to the benefits derived through those statutes,—namely, a copy of the indictment and a list of the witnesses ten days before the trial. We understand, it was assumed in the argument throughout, that the 6th count of the indictment did fall within the provisions of the acts referred to; and the decision consequently turned upon a point that was unargued—one which the counsel for the prisoners thought too clear for argument, and one on which we are informed the counsel for the crown did not mean to rely.

It will be in the recollection of our readers, that the treason charged in the 6th count of the indictment was a compassing of the Queen's death, and that one of the overt acts alleged in it in support of such charge, was a conspiracy to put the Queen to death.

It only remains to be considered, whether such treason did or not range within, and was or not a treason for which provision was made by that part of the 36 Geo. 3, which was extended to Ireland by the 11 and 12 Vic. The 36 Geo. 3, enacts, that "if any person shall, during the life of his Majesty the then king, and until the end of the next session of parliament after a demise of the Crown, compass, imagine, invent, devise, or intend death or destruction, or any bodily harm tending to death or destruction, maim or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the person of our Sovereign Lord the King, his heirs and successors, and such compassings, imaginations, intentions, and devices shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing, or by any overt act or deed, every such person, upon conviction, shall be adjudged a traitor."

The 57 Geo. 3 made perpetual the provisions which related to the heirs and successors of his Majesty, and by the 4th section enacted, that any person indicted for any offence made or declared to be high treason by this act, shall be entitled to the benefit of the 7 W. 3 and the 7 of Anne, (whereby the list of the witnesses and copy of the indictment were to be given ten days before the trial.) save and except in cases of high treason in compassing or imagining the death of any heir or successor of his Majesty, where the overt act or overt acts of such treason, which shall be alleged in the indictment for such offence shall be assassination or killing of any heir or successor of his Majesty, or any direct attempt against the life of any heir or successor of his Majesty, or any direct attempt against the person of any heir or successor, whereby the life of such heir or successor may suffer bodily harm.

The 11 & 12 Vic., c. 12, after reciting that doubts were entertained whether the provisions made perpetual by the 57 Geo. 3 extended to Ireland, and that it was expedient to repeal all such of the provisions so made perpetual, and all the provisions of the 57 Geo. 3 in relation thereto, save such of the same as relate to offences against the person of the sovereign, enacts, "that from the passing of this act, the provisions of the said act of the 36 Geo. 3, made perpetual by the act of the 57th of the same reign, and all the provisions of the said last-mentioned act in relation thereto, save such of the same respectively as relate to the compassing or imagining the death or destruction of the heirs and successors of his said Majesty, King Geo. 3, and the expressing, uttering, or declaring of such compassings or imaginings, shall be and the same are hereby repealed;" and by the second section the unrepealed provisions are extended to Ireland.

Was, then, the offence charged in the sixth count—a compassing to put the Queen to death—an offence within the provisions of the 36 Geo. 3, and was it an offence either made or declared treason by the 57 Geo. 3? If it were not such an offence, of course the benefits given by these statutes could not have been claimed by the prisoners; or again, if it were an offence within the range of those acts, did the saving in the 4th section of the 57 Geo. 3, exclude the prisoners from the benefits given by the former part of the section.

The counsel for the prisoners assumed that it was such an offence, and also assumed that a conspiracy to put her Majesty to death was not either assassination, killing, or any direct attempt against her Majesty's life, so as to come within the saving in the 4th section of the 57 Geo. 3.

The sixth count of the indictment, as we have seen, charged a compassing the Queen's death, and so fell within the 36 Geo. 3, in terms, "shall compass the death of the King, his heirs or successors." The conspiracy to put the Queen to death was charged as an overt act, and so fell within the terms of the same statute, "and such compassing shall express, utter, or declare, by publishing any printing or writing, or by any overt act or deed." According to plain, unambiguous English language, therefore, it would have appeared to us to have been an offence within the statute, and we were anxious to ascertain why it was held not to range within its provisions. The English Judges content themselves by affirming, "It is enough to say, that the charge in the 6th count is not for any treason made or declared by that statute"—i. e., the 57 Geo. 3, which, as we have before seen, made perpetual the provisions of the 36 Geo. 3.

In the next sentence, they state that the 4th section of the 57 Geo. 3 "is limited to treasons made or declared by that act, and the treason which is the subject of the sixth count was not one of them, and to which, therefore, it does not apply."

This is the only light that we can extract from the opinion, and it is not satisfactory. What were the treasons made or declared? One was, certainly, "compassing the death of the King, his heirs or successors." Where are the words of exclusion? where the words of restriction?

We confess, were it not for some passages in the judgment of the Irish Chief Justice, we should have been altogether at a loss to divine why the sixth count of the indictment could be supposed to be not within the 36 Geo. 3 or the 57 Geo. 3.

That passage is as follows:—

"I now come to consider the position contended for by the Crown, and, I think, successfully, that even though persons indicted under the 11 & 12 Vic. would be entitled to the benefit of the English statutes, the plaintiffs here could not be so, the indictments not containing any overt acts of personal violence. I have already stated that the 36 Geo. 3, c. 7, appears to me to refer to two distinct classes of treason, the one having for its object the protection of the person of the Sovereign, and the other the preservation of his authority and government; and I think these two classes are unequivocally recognized and distinguished by the 11 & 12 Vic. c. 12, which, after a full recital of all the treasons made or declared by the 36 Geo. 3, c. 7, sets out in the preamble, that its object was to repeal such of the provisions so recited as did not relate to offences against the person of the Sovereign. This is a plain declaration, that some of them do and some of them do not relate to offences against the person of the sovereign. The enactments are in exact conformity with the preamble. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion, that though now, as before the act, the charge of compassing the death of the Sovereign might be sustained under the 25 of Edward 3, by any overt act against her imperial authority, as well as against her person; yet, that the 11 & 12 Vic. c. 12, was confined to the latter species of treason, and that as this indictment is framed, it cannot be considered as founded upon its provisions."

Now, with reference to the point, that the indictment does not contain any overt act of personal violence, the answer would be obvious, that the 36 Geo. 3 did not require any particular species of overt act, but uses expressly the words, "any overt act or deed;" and further, even if it did require an overt act of personal violence, a conspiracy to take away the Queen's life was such an overt act. And on the point, that the statute contemplated two distinct species of treason, the protection of the person and the preservation of authority—admitting this to be the fact, it would appear to us that the sixth count of the indictment, as appearing on the record, did embrace a treason against the person of her Majesty. To compass the Queen's death, by a conspiracy to put her to death, is surely an attempt against her person, and we see nothing in the act to limit its provisions to open acts of personal violence.

The Irish Chief Justice, though he relied upon, did not rest his judgment on that point merely, and the other judges in the Queen's Bench have did not rely upon it at all.

We have heard it suggested, that the English Judges may have decided the case on another ground; namely, that they may have construed the word "declared" in the 4th section of the 57 Geo. 3 as "newly declared;" and that as the sixth count was not for a treason newly declared, that statute, as extended to Ireland, was inapplicable to the indictment. We can scarcely, however, believe that their decision could have rested on such a construction, when it is apparent from the same section that the Legislature understood old as well as new treasons to have been comprised in the first part of the section, as they expressly provided, as we have seen before, for the case, where the party was indicted for the old and not "newly declared" treason, of compassing the Queen's death, where the overt act was assassination, and enacted that a party indicted for such an offence should not be entitled to the privileges previously conferred.

The design, we apprehend, of the 11 & 12 Vic. was, to retain as treason all attempts against the person and the life of the sovereign, whether direct or indirect, whether by open attack against her life, or by secret designs, as by conspiracy; and to make felony offences which were not directed against the life of her Majesty, but against her authority.

The Irish Judges decided the question on the broad ground, that the privilege conferred by the acts of William and Anne on prisoners tried in England, is not extended to Ireland; and if their decision had been upheld on this ground, we could have no reason, as lawyers, to be dissatisfied—though a grave question of constitutional law has been and is involved in the inquiry why this difference of practice should prevail in the administration of the criminal law of the two countries.

The English judges avoided the substantial question, decided on a preliminary point, and assigned no reason for arriving at their conclusion. We cannot, therefore, but feel regret and disappointment at the abrupt termination of a case which involved such important questions, and it is clear it must have been hurriedly decided, or the judges could not have stated, as they did, that the counsel for the prisoners contended for the glaring absurdity, that the 36 Geo. 3 extended proprio vigore to Ireland—a position which, we should think, no member of the English or Irish bar ever contended for.

Like the former measures for the relief of the Poor, the Bill now before the House, to amend the acts for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland, is conversant chiefly with the details of making, levying, and enforcing the payment of rates. No section, no line, no word, is introduced, indicating the slightest intention on the part of the Government to direct the vast amount of pauper labour now at their disposal to any work of public utility or improvement.

An original policy of the Poor-law—namely, to force proprietors to employ their population in the improvement of their properties, by presenting to them the alternatives of exertion or ruin—having eminently failed among the deeply-incumbered estates of the West and South, another and a more decisive policy has been adopted,—namely, to root out those owners of property who could not, or would not, be roused to exertion, and whose ruin, under the operation of the Poor-law, was too slow for the anxiety of the Government—it may have been, for the necessities of the country.

Under the belief that proprietors themselves would be glad to be rid of properties of which they were the mere nominal owners, the Government, last session, brought in a bill to facilitate the sale of incumbered estates; it might have been more appropriately designated as the "Incumbered Bill for the Sale of Estates." This belief as to this anxiety on the part of proprietors, having proved delusive, and the machinery being found not convenient for creditors, another Bill, with in some respects more extensive and in others more limited powers, has been introduced this session.

By this concurrent measure, the Government has endeavoured to aid the operation of the poor-law; however, lest the forbearance of creditors might render trifling the operations of the Incumbered Estates Bill, there are introduced into the present amendment of the Poor-law, enactments which will confer upon Government the power of initiating proceedings for the sale of estates, and at the same time urge every incumbrancer to press properties into the market.

We allude to the enactments of the 12th and 13th sections of the bill; the 12th section enacts that civil bill decrees for the recovery of poor rate, shall by a short and simple process, become equivalent to judgments recovered in any superior court; and the 13th section enacts, that all judgments obtained for poor rates in a superior court, and all civil bill decrees for poor rates, rendered equivalent to judgments, as provided in the 12th section, shall take priority before all charges and incumbrances whatsoever—crown and quit rents, tithe rent charge, and charges existing under the "act to facilitate the improvement of landed property in Ireland," excepted. By the first of these enactments, the government have secured to themselves the power of initiating proceedings for the sale of any estate where the poor rate may be allowed to fall into arrear; by the second, the fears of creditors will be awakened by the knowledge that the proprietor may materially injure their security, merely by the non-payment of poor rates.

By persons about to purchase or to take land, as well as by the unembarrassed owners of well circumstanced properties, the limitation of the amount to which property is chargeable for poor rate, will be hailed as a boon; but to embarrassed landlords and tottering farmers it will be of little service—the poor rate yet chargeable is too heavy for their ruined resources. However, it is no part of the government plan to save men of this class—they must be cut down as fruitless cumberers of the earth, and their properties, sold at ruinously low prices, will serve to induce capitalists to undertake the profitable employment of the population—a task which the government have considered beyond their power, or out of their province to undertake.

All powerful as may be the effect of thus introducing "new energy and new blood" into the country, we are not satisfied that in a "bill to amend the acts for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland," some enactment providing for the useful or profitable employment of the able-bodied paupers, was not introduced. However expeditiously the country may right itself under a changed system, a considerable time must elapse before the surplus labour of the population can be absorbed into the cultivation of the soil, and in the mean time, the labour test (as it is called) might, in our opinion, be just as well applied by requiring the recipients of out-door relief to work at the earth-works of a railroad, as by requiring them to attend at a quarry and break stones; and the future advancement of the country towards prosperity, which is, or ought to be, the aim of all those bills, would be much more promoted by the former course than by the latter. The government seem deterred from attempting to turn to any useful purpose the labour of the able-bodied paupers, by the recollection of the ill success attending the administration of relief, through employment on public works; they seem to ascribe as inherent to the system itself, the errors committed in carrying it out; and with such nervous apprehension did they contemplate any return to this system, that it was a long time before the able-bodied paupers—though fed at the public expense—were allowed to be employed in rendering the roads—which had been torn up under the Board of Works, and left in an unfinished state—passable. However, after much delay and expostulation, the paupers were so employed, and as no evil result followed, it formed fair subject of hope that the principle “that it was dangerous to employ pauper labour usefully” would have been ere now deserted.

Before, however, the limitation of the amount to which property is liable for poor rate can produce the full relief intended, a new valuation of the ruined unions will be necessary; the valuation at present existing, and according to which rates are now levied, was made before the famine. Two causes have since conspired to depress the value of land, viz. the failure of the potato, and the decrease of the population—both causes tend to destroy that very minute subdivision of land, which, at the same time, produced two apparently opposite extremes, the maximum of poverty and of rents; a valuation made under these circumstances is greatly disproportionate to the present value of property, and cannot be continued as a basis on which to levy so heavy a tax as seven shillings in the pound. However, to the solvent proprietor or purchaser, this limitation will offer strong inducements to exertion, and if the property of the country is transferred into such hands, we have no doubt a re-valuation would be soon insisted upon.

By another provision the interests of this class are still further attended to, and their energies stimulated; improvements are to remain unchargeable with poor rate for seven years. If the bills now before the house will produce the effect they are expected, and seem calculated to produce,—namely, rooting out the present race of encumbered proprietors, and handing over their properties to richer and more industrious men—if these new proprietors, in place of making profit of their purchases, by renting them out to small tenants, will themselves undertake their cultivation, will reside and give employment—we should expect to see a mighty change worked in the appearance and fortunes of the country, within seven years. Comfortable farm-houses, hedge-rows and well cultivated fields, replacing waste and desolation—employment taking the place of out-door relief—and boards of vice-guardians giving way to men, at once proprietors and cultivators of the soil. If such a destiny awaits this country, men in a few years will smile at the fears which suggested this provision, and will pity the present proprietors, whose indolence or whose poverty required such encouragement to stimulate them to exertion; but at present the provision is a valuable one, and will, we hope, lead to good results.

By the 5th section, rent-charges, by way of annuity and jointure, are made liable to deduction for poor rates; but of mortgages and judgments no notice is taken—these still remain unchargeable—the mortgagees and judgment-creditors are entitled to their full interest, whilst judgments can be obtained against the nominal owners of poverty-stricken and profitless estates for seven shillings in the pound on their valuations. If the legislature have come to the conclusion, that encumbered proprietors are an obstacle to the improvement of the country, they seem to have omitted no means of removing them.

THE uniform practice of the English Courts has in all cases been to refuse the sheriff the costs of obtaining the interpleader rule, under the 1 & 2 W. 4, c. 58, Eng. In Bryant v. Ikey, (1 Dev. P. C. 480,) the Counsel for the sheriff contended that the class of cases in which the Court had been accustomed to refuse the sheriff his costs, were those in which there appeared to be a bona fide execution on the one side, and a bona fide claim upon the other; that the execution creditor, by his non-appearance having admitted himself in error, and abandoned his rights, and having improperly forced the sheriff into Court, was entitled to his costs. But the Court said, that if the sheriff were to be allowed his costs in cases where either the claimant or execution creditor failed to appear, both would appear to save the expense of those costs; that the judges had therefore thought it better to draw one strict line, and in no case to allow costs to the sheriff.

This practice, though adopted in the earlier cases under the similar act 9 & 10 Vic. c. 64, in Ball v. Bruen, (Bl. D. & O.) and in a recent case in the Common Pleas, Alexander v. Handy, (11 Ir. L. Rep. 330,) has not been unanimously approved of in this country, and has been expressly over-ruled by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Scully v. Figges, (1 Ir. Jur. 36 Ex.;) Loomis v. Blake, (ib.)

The ground upon which the English Courts have founded their practice, is, that the Act confers a large benefit upon the sheriff, by relieving him from a liability he would be otherwise subject to. No question turns upon the construction of these acts, the allowance of costs being in every case entirely in the discretion of the Court.

We think the practice adopted by the Court of Exchequer in this country is certainly more just than that of the English Courts, and is that which is adopted in interpleader suits in Equity. Pear v. Gilham, (Coop. 58,) Aldridge v. Messer, (6 Ves.

417,) in which the plaintiff is entitled to his costs from the fund in the first instance; and though a sheriff cannot proceed for relief in a Court of Equity, Kingsley v. Bolton, (1 V. & B. 335,) it is not easy to understand on what principle he is to be put to expense because the Legislature had lightened a liability incurred in the discharge of his duty—the principle on which Courts of Equity invariably give ordinary persons their costs appearing to be equally applicable to the case of sheriffs.

A BILL FOR CONSOLIDATING AND AMENDING SEVERAL OF THE LAWS RELATING TO ATTORNIES AND SOLICITORS IN IRELAND.*

Note—The words printed in Italics are proposed to be inserted in committee.

Whereas it is expedient to amend several of the laws relating to attorneys and solicitors practising in Ireland: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that so much of the 7 Geo. 2 as relates to the better regulating the payment of the fees of attorneys and solicitors; and also the 1 & 2 Geo. 4, be and the same are hereby repealed, save so far as such acts or parts of acts, or any of them, repeal the whole or any part of the same or any other act or acts, and also save and except so far as relates to any matters or things done at any time before the passing of this act, all which matters and things shall be and remain good, valid, and effectual to all intents and purposes whatsoever as if this act had not passed, and also save and except as to the recovery and application of any penalty for any offence which shall have been committed before the passing of this act.

II. That from and after the passing of this act no attorney or solicitor, nor any executor, administrator, or assignee of any attorney or solicitor, shall commence or maintain any action or suit for the recovery of any fees, charges, or disbursements for any business done by such attorney or solicitor, until the expiration of one month after such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, shall have delivered unto the party to be charged therewith, or sent by the post to or left for him at his counting-house, office of business, dwelling-house, or last known place of abode, a bill of such fees, charges, and disbursements, and which bill shall either be subscribed with the proper hand of such attorney or solicitor (or, in the case of a partnership, by any of the partners, either with his own name or with the name or style of such partnership,) or of the executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, or be enclosed in or accompanied by a letter, subscribed in like manner, referring to such bill; and upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill within such month it shall be lawful, in case the business contained in such bill or any part thereof shall have been transacted in the High Court of Chancery or in any other court of equity, or in any matter of bankruptcy or lunacy, or in case no part of such business shall have been transacted in any court of law or equity, for the Lord High Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls, and in case any part of such business shall have been transacted in any other court, for the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, or Exchequer, or any judge of either of them, and they are hereby respectively required to refer such bill, and the demand of such attorney or solicitor, executor, administrator, or assignee thereupon, to be taxed and settled by the proper officer of the court in which such reference shall be made, without any money being brought into court, and the court or judge making such reference shall restrain such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, from commencing any action or suit touching such demand pending such reference; and in case no such application as aforesaid shall be made within such month as aforesaid, that it shall be lawful for such reference to be made as aforesaid either upon the application of the attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of the attorney or solicitor whose bill may have been so as aforesaid delivered, sent, or left, or upon the application of the party chargeable by such bill with such directions, and subject to such conditions as the court or judge making such reference shall think proper; and such court or judge may restrain such attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, from commencing or prosecuting any action or suit touching such demand pending such reference, upon such terms as shall be thought proper: provided always, that no such reference as aforesaid shall be directed upon an application made by the party chargeable with such bill after a verdict shall have been obtained or a writ of inquiry executed in any action for the recovery of the demand of such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, or after the expiration of twelve months after such bill shall have been delivered, sent, or left as aforesaid, except under special circumstances, to be proved to the satisfaction of the court or judge to whom the application for such reference shall be made; and upon every such reference, if either the attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of the attorney or solicitor, whose bill shall have been delivered, sent, or left, or the party chargeable with such bill, having due notice, shall refuse or neglect to attend such taxation, the officer to whom such reference shall be made may proceed to tax and settle such bill and demand ex parte; and in case any such reference as aforesaid shall be made upon the application of the party chargeable with such bill, or upon the application of such attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, and the party chargeable with such bill shall attend upon such taxation, the costs of such reference shall, except as hereinafter provided for, be paid according to the event of such taxation; that is to say, if such bill when taxed be less by a sixth part than the bill delivered, sent, or left, then such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, shall pay such costs; and if such bill when taxed shall not be less by a sixth part than the bill delivered, sent, or left, then the party chargeable with such bill, making such application or so attending, shall pay such costs; and every order to be made for such reference as aforesaid shall direct the officer to whom such reference shall be made to tax such costs of such reference to be so paid as aforesaid, and to certify what upon such reference shall be found to be due to or from such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, in respect of such bill and demand; and of the costs of such reference, if payable: provided also, that such officer shall in all cases be at liberty to certify specially any circumstances relating to such bill or taxation, and the court or judge shall be at liberty to make thereupon any such order as such court or judge may think right respecting the payment of the costs of such taxation: provided also, that where such reference as aforesaid shall be made when the same is not authorized to be made, except under special circumstances, as herein-before provided, then the said court or judge shall be at liberty, if it shall be thought fit, to give any special directions relative to the costs of such reference: provided also, that it shall be lawful for the said respective courts and judges, in the same cases in which they are respectively authorized to refer a bill which has been so as aforesaid delivered, sent, or left, to make such order for the delivery, by any attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of any attorney or solicitor, of such bill as aforesaid, and for the delivery up of deeds, documents, or papers in his possession, custody, or power, or otherwise touching the same, in the same manner as has heretofore been done as regards such attorney or solicitor by such courts or judges respectively where any such business had been transacted in the court in which such order was made: provided also, that it shall not in any case be necessary, in the first instance, for such attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, in proving a compliance of this act, to prove the contents of the bill he may have delivered, sent, or left, but it shall be sufficient to prove that a bill of fees, charges, or disbursements, subscribed in the manner aforesaid, or enclosed in or accompanied by such letter as aforesaid, was delivered, sent, or left in manner aforesaid; but nevertheless it shall be competent for the other party to show that the bill so delivered, sent, or left was not such a bill as constituted a bona fide compliance with this act: provided also, that it shall be lawful for any judge of the superior courts of law or equity to authorize an attorney or solicitor to commence an action or suit for the recovery of his fees, charges, or disbursements against the party chargeable therewith, although one month shall not have expired from the delivery of a bill as aforesaid, on proof to the satisfaction of the said judge that there is probable cause for believing that such party is about to quit Ireland.

III. That where any person not the party chargeable with any such bill within the meaning of the provisions herein-before contained shall be liable to pay or shall have paid such bill, either to the attorney or solicitor, his executor, administrator, or assignee, or to the party chargeable with such bill as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such person, his executor, administrator, or assignee, to make such application for a reference for the taxation and settlement of such bill as the party chargeable therewith might himself make; and the same reference and order shall be made thereupon, and the same course pursued in all respects, as if such application was made by the party so chargeable with such bill as aforesaid: provided always, that in case such application is made when under the provisions herein contained a reference is not authorized to be made, except under special circumstances, it shall be lawful for the court or judge to whom such application shall be made to take into consideration any additional special circumstances applicable to the person making such application, although such circumstances might not be applicable to the party so chargeable with the said bill as aforesaid if he were the party making the application.

IV. That it shall be lawful, in any case in which a trustee, executor, or administrator has become chargeable with any such bill as aforesaid, for the Lord High Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls, if in his discretion he shall think fit, upon the application of a party interested in the property out of which such trustee, executor, or administrator may have paid or been entitled to pay such bill, to refer the same, and such attorney's, or solicitor's, or executor's, administrator's, or assignee's demand thereupon, to be taxed and settled by the proper officer of the High Court of Chancery, with such directions and subject to such conditions as such judge shall think fit, and to make such order as such judge shall think fit for the payment of what may be found due, and of the costs of such reference, to or by such attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, by or to the party making such application, having regard to the provisions herein contained relative to applications for the like purpose by the party chargeable with such bill, so far as the same shall be applicable to such cases; and in exercising such discretion as aforesaid the said judge may take into consideration the extent and nature of the interest of the party making the application: provided always, that where any money shall be so directed to be paid by such attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, it shall be lawful for such judge, if he shall think fit, to order the same or any part thereof to be paid to such trustee, executor, or administrator so chargeable with such bill, instead of being paid to the party making such application; and when the party making such application shall pay any money to such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor, in respect of such bill, he shall have the same right to be paid by such trustee, executor, or administrator so chargeable with such bill as such attorney or solicitor, or executor, administrator, or assignee of such attorney or solicitor had.

V. That for the purpose of any such reference, upon the application of the person not being the party chargeable within the meaning of the provisions of this act as aforesaid, or of a party interested as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such court or judge to order any such attorney or solicitor, or the executor, administrator, or assignee of any such attorney or solicitor, to deliver to the party making such application a copy of such bill, upon payment of the costs of such copy: provided always, that no bill which shall have been previously taxed and settled shall be again referred, unless under special circumstances the court or judge to whom such reference is made shall think fit to direct a re-taxation thereof.

VI. That the payment of any such bill as aforesaid shall in no case preclude the court or judge to whom application shall be made from referring such bill for taxation, if the special circumstances of the case shall, in the opinion of such court or judge, appear to require the same, upon such terms and conditions and subject to such directions as to such court or judge shall seem right, provided the application for such reference be made within twelve calendar months after payment.

VII. That in all cases in which such bill shall have been referred to be taxed and settled the officer to whom such reference is made shall be at liberty to request the proper officer of any other court having such an officer to assist him in taxing and settling any part of such bill, and such officer so requested shall thereupon proceed to tax and settle the same, and shall have the same powers in respect thereof as upon a reference to him by the court of which he is such officer, and shall return the same, with his opinion thereon, to the officer who shall have so requested him to tax and settle the same.

VIII. That all applications made under this act to refer any such bill as aforesaid to be taxed and settled, and for the delivery of such bill, and for the delivering up of deeds, documents and papers, shall be made in the matter of such attorney or solicitor; and that upon the taxation and settlement of any such bill the certificate of the officer by whom such bill shall be taxed shall (unless set aside or altered by order, decree, or rule of court,) be final and conclusive as to the amount thereof, and payment of the amount certified to be due and directed to be paid may be enforced according to the course of the court in which such reference shall be made; and in case such reference shall be made in any court of common law it shall be lawful for such court or any judge thereof to order judgment to be entered up for such amount, with costs, unless the retainer shall have been disputed previous to the commencement of the taxation, or to make such other order thereon as such court or judge shall deem proper.

IX. That in the construction of this act the word

"month" shall be taken to mean a calendar month; and every word importing the singular number only shall extend and be applied to several persons, matters, or things, as well as one person, matter or thing; and every word importing the plural number shall extend and be applied to one person, matter, or thing, as well as several persons, matters, or things; and every word importing the masculine gender only shall extend and be applied to a female as well as a male; and the word "person" shall extend to any body politic, corporate or collegiate, municipal, civil, or ecclesiastical, aggregate or sole, as well as an individual, unless in any of the cases aforesaid it be otherwise specially provided, or there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction.

X. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in the present session of parliament.

A BILL TO MAKE TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR A GENERAL RATE IN AID OF CERTAIN DISTRESSED UNIONS AND ELECTORAL DIVISIONS IN IRELAND.*

[AS AMENDED BY THE COMMITTEE.]

Whereas, it is expedient, for a limited time, to make further provision for the relief of the destitute poor chargeable on certain unions and electoral divisions in Ireland: be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners for administering the laws for the relief of the poor in Ireland, with the approval of the Lord Lieutenant, or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland, for the time being, during each of the years ending the thirty-first day of December, one thousand, eight hundred and forty-nine, and the thirty-first day of December, one thousand, eight hundred and fifty, to fix and declare from time to time the amount of such sum as the said Commissioners shall deem it necessary should be raised for the purpose aforesaid, and to assess the same upon the several Unions in Ireland in proportion to the annual value of the property in each union rateable to the relief of the poor, according to the valuation thereof for poor rates in force for the time being; provided that the sum so to be levied in any union, in each of the said two years, shall not exceed sixpence in the pound on such annual value; and the said Commissioners shall transmit to the Guardians of each Union an order under their seal, stating the amount so assessed on such Union, and the amount thereof which shall be leviable on each electoral division of such Union, according to the net annual value of the rateable property in such electoral divisions respectively.

II. And be it enacted, that the guardians of each union shall, in the rate to be made on each electoral division of the union next after the receipt of such order, provide for the sum leviable on such division, according to the order of the commissioner as aforesaid; and from and after the making of the rate on such division next after the receipt of such order the treasurer of the union shall, out of all lodgments made with him of such rate, or any subsequent rate, on account of such division, reserve one moiety of all such lodgments, and place the same to the credit of such division in an account to be entitled "The Union Rate in Aid Account," until the whole sum leviable on such division under the said order shall have been reserved and placed to such account as aforesaid; and the treasurer of such union shall pay over from time to time all sums so reserved as aforesaid on account of the proportion leviable on each electoral division into the bank of Ireland, to be there placed to a separate account in the name of the paymaster of civil services in Ireland, to be entitled "The General Rate in Aid Account."

III. And be it enacted, that the Commissioners of her Majesty's treasury shall be empowered to order the payment of the sum standing in such separate account at the Bank of Ireland as aforesaid, or of any part thereof, to such person or persons, at such time and times, and under such conditions and restrictions as the said Commissioners of her Majesty's treasury shall think fit, for the purpose of affording relief to destitute poor persons in any union or electoral division in Ireland, or of assisting the emigration of such destitute poor persons, or for the purpose of repaying any advance which may have been made as hereinafter provided out of the Consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for any of the purposes aforesaid.

IV. And be it enacted, that for the more speedy affording of such relief it shall be lawful for the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury to direct that any sum or sums not exceeding in the whole £100,000 shall be issued and paid, out of the growing produce of the said consolidated fund, to such person or persons and at such time and times as the said commissioners shall from time to time direct; and such sum or sums shall be charged on and be payable out of the produce of any rate or rates to be levied in any union or unions in Ireland under the provisions and in pursuance of this act.

V. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in the present session of parliament.

Sir,
I have examined your Indian Rubber Blacking, and find it well adapted to those materials which are most proper for such a composition. It has many advantages in use not possessed by similar articles of manufacture; it is susceptible of a very high polish. It does not soil, and is permanent on the leather in a baneful character."

DUBLIN, JUNE 9, 1849.

THE Incumbered Estates bill has passed its third reading in the House of Commons with only twelve dissentient voices. Whatever may be its effect on the destinies of the country—whether it will be the means of driving out poverty and desolation and introducing capital and wealth, or, like its elder brother, remain a dead letter on the statute book—it will soon be the law of the land.

If it does not succeed its failure will not be attributable to any complication of machinery, any difficult or technical processes, obstructing the simplicity of its operation, at least no obstacle of this kind is created by the bill; unlike its predecessor, the present bill indicates or requires no defined course of procedure, it merely hints that the first step shall be by application to the Commissioners according to forms framed and to be circulated by themselves; it leaves all other and further processes entirely at their discretion, subject to a continuing or disallowing power entrusted to the Irish Privy Council, except in cases where no general rule may happen to apply, when the Commissioners are given an unshackled discretionary power. The bill declares the intention of the Legislature, confers powers on the Commissioners to enable them to carry out this intention, but leaves the details of the machinery entirely to themselves.

Professing ourselves favourable, as we have always been, to every useful measure of law reform, we confess we cannot look with entire satisfaction upon the whole of this measure. It creates a new tribunal for a limited period with the largest possible powers, over the most delicate of all subjects of legislation—questions of property. No one can be more sensible than we are of the sad state of the south and west of Ireland, where vast districts are in the hands of nominal proprietors, whose embarrassments, either self-created, or derived from several generations of improvident forefathers, render them altogether unable to discharge the duties of property, more especially to a people who have always lived on the verge of destitution, and who now, by the visitation of Providence, have passed that verge, and are dying by thousands of famine and plague.

Sensible then of the necessity that property should be transferred, it is not the fact of transfer that we comment on. The bill has certainly many advantages; and, first, the Commissioners are empowered to sell, and give an indefensible title; the difficulty of making title to estates, both extra-judicially and judicially, was one of the many elements which hitherto prevented their free sale, this difficulty the Legislature now removed by giving the Commissioners a power to confer on the purchaser, on his payment of the purchase-money, a good title against all the world, the inducements held out to them are twofold, sales will be rendered quick and cheap, and the purchaser completely secure in the possession of his purchase.

The cheapness and quickness of sale will be an encouragement as well to incumbancers to sell, as to capitalists to buy; many incumbancers—those whose securities possess a low priority—have been deterred from taking any steps towards the sale of a property, by the fear that the cost, added to the depreciated value of the estate, would exhaust the fund created by the sale before those charges were reached. Those fears, as far as the costs are concerned, the legislature has taken much pains to dispel, as direct provisions are introduced against them, no fees being allowed to any officer under the commission, except a very trifling remuneration for copying orders; and the Commissioners are even precluded from making fees payable by any general rule. This immunity from the payment of any office fees we regard as a great boon to the owners of incumbered estates, and incumbrancers; and as the salaries of the Commissioners, and other officers, and other expenses of carrying the measure into execution, are to be paid out of moneys to be provided by parliament, the operation of the bill—if it will be distasteful to proprietors, whom it will deprive of the nominal ownership of estates—will effect the transfer with as little injustice to them as possible—applying the whole proceeds of the estate, except the absolutely necessary costs, either to the payment of the debts due by it, or, (in the event of its discharging those) to the use of the owner himself. To the capitalist, the prospect of being put into immediate possession—in place of being kept many years in suspense, pending the suit, with a chance that in the event of the seller not being able to make title, that he may be obliged to institute a suit for the recovery of the instalment he has paid—will operate as a very considerable inducement to purchase.

The privileges created by the bill, are only conferred on incumbrances created by the owners of estates of inheritance, or owners entitled to the whole estate in leases in perpetuity, or leases of which not less than 60 years shall be unexpired and incumbered, or under powers created by owners of such estates. Persons possessed of charges of these descriptions, are empowered by the bill—within three years after its passing—to apply for a sale of the estates affected by these charges; interests in remainder are thus respected, and all derivative interests are jealously protected, and, in fact, strengthened by the transfer, as the 22nd section requires that the conveyance from the Commissioners to the purchaser shall refer to all tenancies, leases, or under-leases, subject to which the sale is made.

The 37th section will probably put an end to many suits. It provides that application may be made for a sale, and an order made by the Commissioners, notwithstanding any pending proceeding in a court of Equity, or any decree of such court made for a sale, and shall, if they see fit, order the sale of the land or lease decreed to be sold without further inquiry. By this provision much useless litigation and expense will be put a stop to—even where the decree for a sale has been obtained—as, under the new tribunal, complicated and expensive searches to make title to the purchaser, will be rendered unnecessary, and, at the same time, the title conferred made more complete and satisfactory.

The 36th section confers a very salutary power on the Commissioners, and will, we hope, have the effect of preventing applications to them merely for malignant or vexatious purposes. By this sec. it is enacted, that they shall have full power and discretion as to giving or withholding costs and expenses, and as to the person by whom and the funds out of which the same shall in the first instance or ultimately be paid. The Commissioners, acting under this section, will doubtless take into account the intent with which, and circumstances under which, any application is made; and will not allow incumbrancers, who have in no event any rational hope of realizing their charges, to gratify themselves by taking the initiative in the ruin of a property, or taking steps merely with a view to embarrass other incumbrancers.

On the whole, we see much to admire in this enactment; but we cannot see the absolute necessity there was for the creation of a new tribunal, to effect all that is contemplated by it. Much as has been said of its confiscating tendency, we can not find fault with an enactment which facilitates the transfer of property, when the circumstances of the country absolutely demand that it should change hands; and though we lament that a great amount of property will be forced into the market at a time when circumstances of an unprecedented character have depreciated its value, yet we must give the framers of the measure credit for endeavouring to obviate, to the utmost of their power, the ill effects of these unhappy circumstances. In the first place, by giving a good title to the purchaser, the price of the estate will probably be much increased; and in the next place, by diminishing the expense of the sale, the balance applicable to the payment of debts, the chance of there being a surplus for the maintenance of the owner, will be also much increased, by the operation of which two causes proprietors and incumbrancers will be placed in a much better position than if left to the old remedy by Bill in Equity. But that the remedy by Bill in Equity could not be moulded to suit the altered circumstances of the country and of the time, and that it would not be, at the least, as safe and satisfactory to entrust powers such as those conferred on the Commissioners by the present Bill, on the Chancellor—as on men who are as yet unknown—we cannot admit.

The narrator of the proceedings of an equity suit must record that the preliminary proceedings were in many instances unnecessarily prolix, tedious and expensive, that the expense of obtaining a decree to account was almost the same whether the suit were amicable or adverse, that the property underwent a wasting process under the dominion of a receiver, and we trust it will be in his power to relate that a measure was devised by which title was made secure, sales completed without delay, property handed over uninjured to the new proprietor, and creditors paid with expedition. It will be difficult to realize these conceptions; the new measure will, however, go some way towards showing that property may be sold at a more accelerated rate than at present. The limited duration of the new tribunal, the lowness of the salaries of the Commissioners, the remuneration being inadequate to secure men of the first ability, the arbitrary powers conferred upon them, the power of appeal resting with themselves, and, when permitted, being to a tribunal not calculated to inspire much legal confidence—the Privy Council, are calculated seriously to impair the general effectiveness of the measure. The country also is burdened with an increased expense, when the existing tribunals are amply sufficient to perform all the legal business of the country. It would have been more inexpensive and as efficacious if the powers conferred by the bill were vested in the Court of Chancery. However, we look forward to this measure as being the pioneer to one of lasting usefulness: by which the Equity courts can hereafter be consolidated, purged of their old excrescences, and form a concentrated system of enlightened jurisprudence.

We could not read without a smile the provision contained in the concluding part of the 38th section of this bill, prohibiting an incumbrancer, from commencing, taking, continuing, or prosecuting any proceeding whatsoever, under the act of last session "to facilitate the sale of incumbered estates in Ireland," without leave of the Commissioners. It reminded us of one of the prohibited degrees, within which it is declared that a man "shall not marry."

The Legislature, we presume, has felt that the owners of tithe rent charge were unequally and unjustly taxed under the various poor law acts, that they had exempted them from liability to the labour rate act, 9 & 10 Vic. c. 107. However they repented of their leniency, and by the 10 & 11 Vic. c. 107, have introduced words which impose the liability.

The first statute, by the 8th section, provided for the repayment of advances by half yearly instalments; not less than four, nor more than twenty to be presented by the grand juries of the different counties, and levied off the baronies in which the works for which the advances had been made were executed; and by the 9th section, enacted that the moneys to be raised should be charged and levied upon the occupiers, and other persons rated under the poor law acts. The applotment, was to be made, and the money levied by the high constable of the barony, and to be recoverable as grand jury cess. The effect of this section was the adoption of the poor law valuation as the basis of levy, and making the parties liable to payment the occupiers or immediate lessors.

The 12th section allowed the person liable to pay a rent, to deduct for each pound of rent one-half of the amount of the levy, irrespective of the consideration whether the rent were greater or less than the net annual value; and the 13th section empowered any person receiving rent, and also liable to pay a rent, to deduct from the rent paid by him a sum bearing such a proportion to the amount of such assessment deducted from the rent received, as the rent paid bears to the rent received.

It was under this clause that any question could have been raised as to the liability of the tithe owner; in no portion of the act is he expressly mentioned; and it was plain, in our judgment, that the statute was confined to cases either expressly included, or to those in which the relation of landlord and tenant existed, and that there were no words to charge the tithe owner.

The language of the various poor law acts was clear, and the classification of persons liable to poor rate kept perfectly distinct as to occupier, landlord, tithe-owner, or annuitant in fee.

If then any applotment has been made under this act, we think the tithe-owner is not liable; for all assessments made under the 10th and 11th Vic. c. 57, we fear that he is.

This later act remitted one half of the advance, and has made the other repayable by twenty half yearly instalments, to be raised as poor-rate, and be received by the high constable; and the 7th section contains the following words—"and the several clauses, provisions, powers, authorities in the said first recited act, contained with respect to the moneys to be raised and levied under the same, and with respect to any deduction to be made from any rent, in respect of any assessments under the said act, and also the several provisions and powers of the said acts for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland, with respect to any such deduction to be made from rent or tithe, shall be extended and applied to the moneys to be assessed, raised, or levied under the provisions of this act, and the several words or expressions to which an extended meaning is given in the said first recited act shall include the like significations in this act."

The new poor law amendment bill contains no provision for the more equitable adjustment of the poor rate in the tithe-owner. Most certainly, in common justice, the gross inequalities of the pressure upon them should be removed.

It is grossly and glaringly unjust, that they alone in the community should be subjected to a double deduction, for a tax which weighs heavily and oppressively.

ANALYSIS OF A BILL TO PROTECT JUSTICES OF THE PEACE IN IRELAND FROM VEXATIOUS ACTIONS FOR ACTS DONE BY THEM IN THE EXECUTION OF THEIR OFFICE.*

Note.—The words printed in italics are proposed to be inserted in the Committee.

Whereas it is expedient to protect justices of the peace in Ireland in the execution of their duty: be it enacted, That every action to be brought against any justice of the peace in any of the superior courts of law at Dublin, for any act done in the execution of his duty, and within his jurisdiction as such justice, shall be an action on the case; and in the declaration it shall be alleged that such act was done maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause; and if at the trial upon the general issue being pleaded, the plaintiff shall fail to prove such allegation, he shall be nonsuit, or a verdict shall be given for the defendant.

II. That for any act done by a justice of the peace in which he has not jurisdiction, or shall have exceeded his jurisdiction, any person injured thereby, or by any act done under any conviction or order made or warrant issued by such justice in any such matter, may maintain an action against such justice, without making any allegation that the act complained of was done maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause: provided that (in any case where a conviction may be quashed either upon appeal or upon application to her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench) no action shall be brought for any thing done under such conviction, or order until after such conviction or order shall have been quashed; nor shall any action be brought for any thing done under any warrant issued by such justice to procure the appearance of such party, and which shall have been followed by a conviction or order, until after such conviction or order shall have been so quashed; or if such last-mentioned warrant shall not have been followed by any such conviction or order, or if it be a warrant upon an information for an indictable offence, nevertheless if a summons were issued previously to such warrant, and such summons were served upon such person, either personally or by leaving the same for him at his last or most usual place of abode, and he did not appear according to the exigency of such summons, in such case no such action shall be maintained against such justice for any thing done under such warrant.

III. That where a conviction or order shall be made by one or more justice or justices, and a warrant of distress or of commitment shall be granted thereon by some other justice bona fide and without collusion, no action shall be brought against the justice who so granted such warrant by reason of any defect in such conviction or order, or for any want of jurisdiction in the justice or justices who made the same, but the action shall be brought against the justice or justices who made such conviction or order.

IV. That where any poor rate shall be made, and a warrant of distress shall issue against any person rated, no action shall be brought against the justice or justices who shall have granted such warrant for any irregularity in the said rate, or because such person was not liable to be rated; and in all cases where a discretionary power shall be given to a justice by any act of parliament, no action shall be brought by reason of the manner in which he shall have exercised his discretion in the execution of any such power.

V. And whereas it would render more effective the performances of the duties of justices, and give them protection, if some simple means were devised by which the legality of any act to be done by such justices might be considered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and such justice enabled to perform it without risk of action; be it enacted, that where a justice or justices of the peace shall refuse to do any act relating to the duties of his or their office, the party requiring such act to be done may apply to her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, upon an affidavit of the facts, for a rule upon such justice or justices, and also the party to be affected by such act to show cause why such act should not be done; and if after service of such rule good cause shall not be shown, the court may make the same absolute, with or without payment of costs, and the said justice or justices upon being served with such rule absolute shall obey the same, and shall do the act required; and no action or proceeding whatsoever shall be prosecuted against such justice or justices for having obeyed such rule, and done such act so thereby required.

VI. That in all cases where a warrant of distress or of commitment shall be granted by a justice of the peace upon any conviction or order which shall have been or shall be confirmed upon appeal, no action shall be brought against such justice who so granted such warrant for any thing done under the same by reason of any defect in such conviction or order.

VII. That where by this act it is enacted that no action shall be brought, if any action shall be brought a judge of the court in which it shall be brought, upon application of the defendant, and upon an affidavit of facts, may set aside the proceedings with or without costs.

VIII. That no action shall be brought against any justice of the peace for any thing done by him in the execution of his office, unless within six calendar months after the act complained of shall have been committed.

IX. That no such action shall be commenced until one calendar month at least after a notice in writing of such intended action shall have been delivered to him, or left at his usual place of abode, by the party intending to commence such action, or by his attorney, in which the cause of action, and the court in which the same is intended to be brought, shall be stated; and upon the back shall be endorsed the name and place of abode of the party intending to sue, and the name and place of abode or of business of the attorney if such notice have been served by attorney.

X. That in every action brought in any of the superior Courts of Law, the venue shall be laid in the county where the act was committed; and the defendant shall be allowed to plead the general issue, and to give any special matter of defence, excuse, or justification in evidence, at the trial of such action.

XI. That in every case after notice of action so given, and before action commenced, such Justice to whom such notice shall be given may tender to the party complaining, or to his attorney, such sum as he may think fit as amends for the injury complained of; and after action commenced, and at any time before issue joined, such defendant, if he have not made such tender, or in addition to such tender, may pay into court such sum of money as he may think fit, and which tender and payment of money into court may afterwards be given in evidence by the defendant at the trial, and if the jury shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to damages beyond the sum so tendered or paid into court, or beyond the sum so tendered and paid into Court, then they shall find for the defendant, and the plaintiff shall not elect to be non-suit, and the sum of money, if any, so paid into court, or so much thereof as shall be sufficient to pay or satisfy the defendant's costs in that behalf, shall thereupon be paid out of court to him, and the residue to the plaintiff; or if, where money is so paid into court, the plaintiff shall accept the same in satisfaction of his damages, he may obtain from any judge of the court an order that such money shall be paid to him, and that the defendant shall pay him his costs to be taxed, and thereupon the said action shall be determined, and such order shall be a bar to any other action for the same cause.

XII. That if at the trial the plaintiff shall not prove that such action was brought within the time herein-before limited, or that notice was given one calendar month before action commenced, or if he shall not prove the cause of action stated in such notice, or if he shall not prove that such cause of action arose in the county or place laid as venue in the margin of the declaration, then such plaintiff shall be nonsuit, or the jury shall find for the defendant.

XIII. That where the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover, and he shall prove the levying or payment of any penalty or sum of money under any conviction or order as parcel of the damages he seeks to recover, or if he prove that he was imprisoned under such conviction or order, and shall seek to recover damages for any such imprisonment, he shall not recover the amount of such penalty or sum so levied or paid, or any sum beyond the sum of two-pence as damages for such imprisonment, or any costs of suit whatsoever, if it shall be proved that he was actually guilty of the offence of which he was so convicted, or that he was liable by law to pay the sum he was so ordered to pay, and (with respect to such imprisonment) that he had undergone no greater punishment than that assigned by law for the offence of which he was so convicted, or for nonpayment of the sum he was so ordered to pay.

XIV. That if the plaintiff in any such action shall recover a verdict, or the defendant shall allow judgment to pass by default, such plaintiff shall be entitled to costs as if this act had not been passed; or if it be stated in the declaration, that the act complained of was done maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause, the plaintiff, if he recover a verdict for any damages, or if the defendant allow judgment to pass against him by default, shall be entitled to his full costs of suit, to be taxed as between attorney and client; and in every action against a justice of the peace for any thing done by him in the execution of his office the defendant, if he obtain judgment upon verdict or otherwise, shall in all cases be entitled to his full costs in that behalf, to be taxed as between attorney and client.

XV. That this act shall extend only to Ireland.

XVI. That this act shall commence and take effect on the XVII. After commencement of this act the following statutes or parts of statutes repealed. 10 Car. I. st. 2. c. 16. (1.) 43 G. 3. c. 143. 43 G. 3. c. 141.

XVIII. That this act shall apply for the protection of all persons for any thing done in the execution of their office, in all cases in which, by the provisions of any act or acts of parliament, the several statutes or parts of statutes herein-before mentioned and by this act repealed would have been applicable if this act had not passed.

XIX. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in the present session of parliament.

26th March, 1849.

A BILL* TO ALTER AND AMEND THE LAW RELATING TO PROCEEDINGS BY ATTACHMENTS IN COURTS OF RECORD IN THE CITY OF DUBLIN, AND OTHER BOROUGHES IN IRELAND.

Note.—The words printed in Italics are proposed to be inserted in the committee.

* Prepared and brought in by Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Richard M. Fox.

Whereas it is expedient and would tend to the more beneficial administration of justice in the Court of Record of the borough of Dublin and in the courts of record of other boroughs in Ireland, and would prevent the improvident and injurious seizure of goods in such boroughs, if the process now in force of proceeding by way of attachment of goods for compelling the appearance of a defendant as well as the process of foreign attachment in the said courts were to cease and determine: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act, it shall not be lawful for any person to proceed by way of attachment against the goods of any person or by foreign attachment in any court of record of any borough of Ireland.

II. And be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act no person shall have power to attach the goods of any defendant upon any process of attachment issuing out of any court of record of any borough in Ireland to compel such defendant to give special bail, but that in all cases where the cause of action shall amount to the sum of ten pounds or upwards the plaintiff shall proceed by way of process issuing out of said court, and returnable to the same on or before a certain day to be named and specified in the said process, and shall serve the defendant or defendants personally with a copy of the said process; and if such defendant or defendants shall not appear at the return of the process, or within four days after such return, in such case it shall and may be lawful to and for the plaintiff or plaintiffs, upon affidavit having been made and filed in the said court of record of any borough in Ireland of the personal service of such process as aforesaid (which affidavit shall be filed gratis), to enter a common appearance or file common bail for defendant or defendants, and to proceed thereon as if such defendant or defendants had actually appeared.

III. And be it enacted, that such affidavit of service of such process shall and may be made before any mayor or recorder of any borough out of the court of record whereof such process shall issue.

IV. And be it enacted, that upon every copy of such process to be served upon any defendant shall be endorsed a notice to such defendant to the intent and meaning of such service to the effect following; that is to say,

"A. B. You are served with this process, to the intent that you may by your attorney appear in the court of record of the borough of _____ at the return thereof, being the _____ day of _____ in order to your defence in this action."

Which said notice shall be signed by the attorney of the plaintiff or plaintiffs with his Christian and surname, and thereunto shall be added his place of residence, and for which notice no fee or reward shall be demanded or taken.

V. Provided always, and be it enacted, that no plaintiff shall enter a common appearance, or file common bail for any defendant unless the plaintiff or his attorney, or the attorney employed for the purpose of having the process personally served, shall make affidavit in writing that such plaintiff or attorney (as the case may be) knows the person so swearing to such service, and that such plaintiff or attorney (as the case may be) believes that such process has been personally served on the defendant at such time as such person shall have sworn to, and in which affidavit the addition and place of residence of the person so swearing to such service shall be inserted, which said affidavit shall be filed gratis.

VI. Provided always, and be it enacted, that whenever it appears to the court out of which the process issues that all due diligence has been used to have the process of the court personally served, yet that under the special circumstances of the case appearing to the court by the affidavit of the plaintiff or his attorney, or the attorney employed for the purpose of having the process personally served, that it was not possible by reasonable diligence to effect personal service, that then and in such case it shall and may be lawful for the court out of which the process issues to substitute such other kind of service as to them shall seem fit.

VII. And be it enacted, that so much of an act passed in the third and fourth years of the reign of her present Majesty, for the regulation of municipal corporations in Ireland, as relates to the process of attachment of goods and the process of foreign attachment in the courts of record of boroughs in Ireland, and is inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

VIII. And be it enacted, that this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of Parliament.

18. That at the Quarter Sessions for which such notice shall be given the court shall proceed to hear and determine the appeal, or they may, if they think fit, adjourn it to the following sessions; and upon the hearing of such appeal the court may mitigate any penalty or forfeiture, or they may confirm or quash the adjudication, and order any money paid by the appellant, or levied by distress upon his goods, to be returned to him, and may also order such further satisfaction to be made to the party injured as they may judge reasonable; and they may make such order concerning the costs, both of the adjudication and of the appeal, as they may think reasonable.

19. That in case the mayor or justice to whom the seizure of any sheep, lambs, or cattle supposed to be infected as aforesaid, or of any meat supposed to be unfit for human food, may have been reported, shall upon inquiry order the same to be restored, and in case it appear to such mayor or justice that there was a probable cause of seizure, then and in such case such mayor or justice shall grant a certificate to the party making the seizure that there was such probable cause, and in such case the person or persons who made such seizure, being a person or persons acting under the authority of this act, or of any order made in pursuance hereof, shall not be liable to any action, indictment, or other suit or prosecution on account of such seizure; and in case any action, indictment, or other suit or prosecution shall be commenced and brought to trial against any person or persons, being a person or persons acting under such authority as aforesaid, on account of the seizure of any animals, parts of animals, hay, straw, fodder, or other articles seized as forfeited under this act, or of any order or orders made under the authority of the same, wherein a verdict shall be given against the defendant or defendants, if the court or judge before whom such information or suit shall have been tried shall have certified on the said record that there was a probable cause for such seizure, then the plaintiff, besides the things seized or the value thereof, shall not be entitled to above 2d. damages, nor to any costs of suit, nor shall the defendant or defendants in such prosecution be liable above 1s.

20. That this act shall continue in force until the 1st of September, 1850, and if parliament be then sitting then further until the end of the then session.

21. Act not to affect the rights, &c. of the city of London.

22. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

24. Providing for cases where more Proprietors than one.
25. Power to mitigate Penalties.
26. Act may be amended.

Whereas an act was passed in the forty-eight year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, for the more effectual administration of the office of a Justice of the peace, and for the more effectual prevention of felonies within the district of Dublin metropolis, and the said act was amended by an act passed in the fifth year of the reign of King George the Fourth: and whereas another act was passed in the session of Parliament holden in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of King William the Fourth, whereby a new and more efficient system of police was established within the limits of the said district: and whereas by several acts passed in the first year, and in the sessions of Parliament holden respectively in the first and second, second and third, and third and fourth years of her present Majesty's reign, the limits of the said district were altered, and divers enactments made in reference to the said district, and for the more effectual maintenance and regulation of the police therein: and whereas by an act of the fifth year of her said Majesty's reign, intitled an act for improving the Dublin police, further provisions were made relating to the same: and whereas it is expedient to amend certain of the provisions of the said acts in manner following: and whereas an act was passed in the Parliament of Ireland in the thirty-seventh year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intitled an act for amending and reducing into one act of parliament the laws relating to hackney and other carriages plying in the city of Dublin, its suburbs and liberties and within seven miles thereof, which act has been amended by several subsequent acts: and whereas by the said recited acts of the thirty-seventh and forty-eight years of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third it is, amongst other things, provided, that the superintendent magistrate and divisional justices appointed under the said acts respectively shall retain and employ certain clerks and other officers, under the regulations therein mentioned, and it is expedient to amend the said provisions: be it therefore enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the passing of this act the power of appointment of all such clerks and officers as aforesaid, and of all other clerks in the police department of the police district of Dublin metropolis, or in the department relating to such hackney or other carriages as aforesaid, or to the receipt of rents, fines, penalties, or monies in respect of the same, shall be vested in the Chief Secretary or the Under Secretary for the time being of the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland, and not in the divisional justices or any of them.

2. And whereas by the said recited Act of the second and third years of the reign of her present Majesty it is, amongst other things, enacted, that in any case where the value of any house or tenement assessed under the said act shall not amount to five pounds, if the occupier and his immediate lessor, by any writing under their hands, shall require, and if the said justices shall by a minute agree thereto, such immediate lessor shall be rated instead of such occupier, and such rebate from the rate may be made (not exceeding Ten per Centum) as the said justices shall by such minute allow, and subject to such further regulations as in the said act contained: be it enacted, that in any case where the immediate lessor of any house or tenement may under the said recited act be rated instead of the occupier, if at the time of making any rate the name of such immediate lessor be not accurately known to the persons making the rate it shall be sufficient to describe him therein as the "immediate lessor," with or without any name or further addition; and such rate shall be held to be duly made on him or her by such description, and shall be recoverable from him or her accordingly, notwithstanding any error or defect in his or her name or description, or the entire omission of such name therein.

3. That after the passing of this act the several collectors appointed to receive the police tax or rate under the provisions of the said recited acts or any of them (after such demand made as in the said recited act of the second and third years of her present Majesty's reign mentioned,) in addition to all other modes and powers heretofore provided by any former act or acts, may collect, levy, sue for, and recover the said police tax or rate, or any part of the same from all and every persons and person who now are or is or hereafter shall be liable to pay the same, by all the ways and means, and with the like remedies and powers in case of non-payment, as the grand jury cess, or the money apportioned on the several persons liable to pay the same, may be collected and levied in any county in Ireland; and the divisional justices of the police district of Dublin metropolis or any one of them shall, for the purposes of raising, levying, or enforcing payment of such police tax or rate, have and exercise the same powers, authorities and jurisdiction within the police district of Dublin metropolis as any justices or justices of the peace of any county in Ireland has or have or can or shall lawfully have or exercise within his or their respective county with respect to any grand jury cess to be raised within the same.

4. And whereas by the thirty-seventh year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, an act for amending and reducing into one act of Parliament the laws relating to hackney and other carriages plying in the city of Dublin, its suburbs and liberties, and within seven miles thereof, it is, amongst other things, enacted, that the superintendent magistrate, from time to time, may alter and increase the fines to be paid or the rents upon the licenses by him granted under the said act now in recital, provided the same be not increased above one fourth part more than the fines and rents thereinbefore mentioned, and to make such rules, orders and regulations for the purpose as to him shall seem meet, and to alter, vary, amend, or annul the same, provided every such alteration, rule, order and regulation respecting the fines or rents so made by the superintendent magistrate shall be approved of by the Lord Chancellor or Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, and the Chief Judges, or any three of them: and whereas no power is thereby given to reduce the said fines or rents: be it enacted, that the divisional justices of the said police district, in case they shall think fit, with the approval of the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland, from time to time may reduce the fines to be paid or the rents to be reserved upon the licenses heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted in respect of any carriages under the said last recited act, or any act amending the same, or afterwards from time to time, with like approval, to increase the same as they may see fit, provided that any such fines or rents shall not be increased so as at any time to exceed the amount now payable for the same.

5. That from and after the passing of this act the commissioners of police of Dublin, with the approval of the chief or under secretary of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to appoint or to alter, as occasion may require, the stands or stations for hackney or other carriages, and also stations commonly called hazards for the same, within the borough of Dublin and the district adjoining the same, as defined in the said last-recited act, or any act amending the same.

6. That, notwithstanding anything in the said last-recited act, or any act or acts, the said Commissioners of Police may license any metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus to ply or carry passengers between any part of the borough of Dublin and any other part of the said borough or of the District adjoining the same as defined under the said recited act of the 37 Geo. 3, or any act amending the same, or between any part of the said district and any other part of the said district, and to fix such rates of fines and rents to be paid in respect of such licence of any such metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, as the said commissioners shall deem fit, and as shall be approved by the Lord Lieutenant or other chief governor or governors of Ireland; provided that such rents and fines shall not exceed the highest rate of rent or fine now or for the being payable in respect of any other hackney carriage in Dublin, and no other duty shall be payable for the same; and the provisions of the said last-recited act, and of any act or acts amending the same, shall extend and apply to such carriages, and to such rents and fines, so far as the same are applicable.

7. That the said commissioners may grant a licence to act as driver of hackney, job, and other carriages licensed for the accommodation and conveyance of passengers, or as driver or as conductor of metropolitan stage carriages or omnibuses, (as the case may be,) to any person who shall produce such a certificate as shall satisfy the said commissioners of his good behaviour and fitness for such situation respectively; provided that no person shall be licensed as such driver as aforesaid who is under sixteen years of age; and in every such licence shall be specified the number of such licence, and the proper name and surname, and place of abode, and age, and a description of the person to whom such licence shall be granted; and every such licence shall bear date on the day on which the same shall be granted, and shall continue in force until the thirty-first of December next after the date; or if granted in the month of November or December in any year, then to continue in force until and upon the thirty-first day of December in the year next following that in which the same shall be granted, except the same shall be sooner revoked, and except the time (if any) during which any such licence shall be suspended; and on every license of a driver or conductor the said commissioners shall cause proper columns to be prepared, in which every proprietor (if any) employing the driver or conductor named in such licence shall enter his own name and address, and the days on which such driver or conductor shall enter and shall quit his service respectively; and in case any of the particulars entered or endorsed upon any licence in pursuance of this act shall be erased or defaced, every such licence shall be wholly void, and of none effect; and the said commissioners shall, at the time of granting any licence, deliver to the driver or conductor to whom the same shall be granted an abstract of the laws in force relating to such driver or conductor, and of the penalties to which he is liable for any misconduct, and also a metal ticket, on which there shall be marked or engraved his office or employment, and a number corresponding with the number which shall be inserted in such licence.

8. That there shall be charged upon and in respect of every such licence to be granted under the authority of this act a fee of two shillings and sixpence, and upon every renewal of such licence a sum of one shilling, to be paid to the said Commissioners, and to be by them applied, after payment of the expense of such ticket, for the purposes of the said police tax or rate.

9. That from and after the first of January, 1849, no person shall act as driver of any hackney or other carriage as aforesaid, or as driver or conductor of any Metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, whether such person shall or shall not be the proprietor of such carriage, within the limits of the said Police district, unless in each case such person shall have a licence so to do, and a numbered ticket granted to him under the authority of this act, and remaining in force; and after the day last aforesaid every person who shall act as such driver or conductor without such licence and ticket, and also every person to whom a licence and ticket shall have been granted, who shall, except in compliance with the provisions of this act, transfer or lend such licence, or permit any other person to use or wear such ticket, shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding forty shillings; and every proprietor who shall knowingly suffer any person not duly licensed under the authority of this act to act as driver of any hackney or other carriage as aforesaid, or as driver or conductor of any metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, of which he shall be the proprietor, shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding forty shillings; provided, that nothing herein-before contained shall subject to any penalty any proprietor who shall employ any unlicensed person to act as such driver or conductor as aforesaid for any time not exceeding twenty-four hours, or any unlicensed person who shall be so employed for the said time, upon proof being adduced by the proprietor, to the satisfaction of the justice before whom such proprietor, driver, or conductor shall be required to attend to answer for such offences respectively, that such employment was occasioned by unavoidable necessity; and that every proprietor who shall so employ such unlicensed driver or conductor, and every such unlicensed driver or conductor, shall be subject to all the powers, provisions, and proceedings of and under this act for any act done by such driver or conductor during such employment, in like manner as if such driver or conductor had been duly licensed.

THE apathy of Irish members when questions of practical importance are brought or proposed to be brought under the consideration of the House has been frequently the subject of public comment and public condemnation. This feeling of indifference was strongly exemplified on Thursday, the 7th, when no House was made for Mr. Osborne's motion to inquire into the system of Chancery Estate Management.

The honorable member, not dismayed by the supineness of the Irish representatives, managed, with considerable tact, and in a speech delivered with great earnestness and much happiness of expression, incidentally to bring the whole question under the consideration of the House on the succeeding evening during the debate on the Irish Poor Laws, and to carry his point, aided by Mr. Napier, in obtaining a Committee of Inquiry. We augur great public benefit from a thorough investigation into this system of monster evil; we observe, by the statement of Lord John Russell, that it had already occupied the attention of our Chancellor, who has submitted to the Government a plan for its amendment. This much we know, that no half measure will be of efficacy to remove this mighty sore which is all but cancerous. It has spread through the whole island, it has removed, from its natural control, a million and a half of rental, and vested the power of the proprietor in an executive which cannot, and if it could, does not know how to use it. The system goes on still with remorseless energy, and threatens to absorb the whole country within its grasp, nothing too vast, nothing too small for its meshes, properties of £10,000 and £10 a-year come equally within its scope. A very few weeks since we reported an application to the Master of the Rolls that the Receiver should only be called on to account once in five years, the property over which he had been appointed being only £10 a-year! Darley v. Hunter, (ante p. 194.) We should be glad to know how much of that £10 a-year found its way into the hands of the creditor. Assuming Mr. Vereker's estimate in his pamphlet, "Economic Consideration of the Judgment Acts," of the expense to be correct—and we have every reason to confide in its accuracy—the costs of appointing and completing the appointment of a receiver, where the petition is unopposed, would amount to £50; adding to this the annual expense of accounting, it is obvious that years would stretch into infinity before this miserable property could pay the debt. The Master of the Rolls refused, and very properly refused to comply with the application, in order that he might shew the utter uselessness of proceeding against so small a property. Whilst we write we are informed that on Wednesday last an application was made to the Master of the Rolls to extend a receiver where the debt was only £5! The expense of extending a receiver is estimated at about £25, his Honour was coerced by the act of Parliament, and was obliged to make the order.

The Court of Exchequer hesitated for some time before they drew up an order for the appointment of a receiver over £20 a-year, but were coerced by the statute, and obliged to make the appointment.

It is not merely that the punishment is severe in the extreme upon the unfortunate debtor, that we denounce the ruinous tendency of the Judgment Acts, and the management of estates by Courts of Equity; the penalty may be, and often is disproportioned to the offence, but if it would deter improvidence and check extravagance, the sanction of the law would be wholesome; it is because that penalty affects not merely the debtor but the creditor, the owner, and the tenant, the individual and the nation, that we have written against it. "The Committee will do wisely, perhaps, to consider not merely the management of estates by Courts of Equity but the laws which make that management necessary—laws which pour properties with a multitudinous rush within their control.

The statutes which regulate judgments require to be extensively modified; as a security affecting lands judgments should either cease to exist or be rendered specific liens like mortgages, or only attach when execution is sued out upon them. This subject is more calculated, however, for the contemplation of a lawyer than the labours of the committee-room; evidence may be useful to show the prejudicial nature of the great staple security of this country: but what will fall more peculiarly within the province of the Committee will be the examination of a class of witnesses who will give them the groundwork of a measure to improve the management of estates which are placed under the control of a Court of Equity. It may be alleged that the period is inopportune to devise such a measure when the outcry of the day, when the legislation of the hour is directed to supersede the Court of Chancery nearly altogether; it may be urged, you are yourselves inconsistent when you advocate an improved law with reference to judgments with the avowed design of rendering it more difficult if not impossible to reach real property through their medium. By the operation of the Incumbered Estates Bill the property will be sold first, and the inquiry as to the parties entitled to its produce be made afterwards, and by a change in the Judgment Acts you will prodigiously diminish the evil of receiverships.

A little consideration will shew how inadequate to meet the existing evils will be the contemplated laws—how illusory the idea that the Court of Chancery will be superseded. It is estimated, from the vast increase of the last two years, that over a million and a half of rental is under the management of our two Courts of Equity. In ordinary times, the purchase-money of these estates, if all destined for the hammer, would be thirty millions. It is incredible to suppose that this vast amount of property can rapidly change hands, but the fact is, that a portion of it is not destined for sale. It belongs to minors and lunatics, and persons under disability, who are the peculiar objects of Courts of Equity, or the incumbrances affect but a life estate, and it would be impolitic of the creditor to incur the expense of making out title, and selling a limited interest. In all such cases the appointment of a receiver is all that is required; whilst civilization continues, whilst real property is made the subject of family settlement and of business transactions, there must be a controlling power vested in a Court of Chancery, or a court with similar powers under another name. The Incumbered Estates Bill is temporary; its functions will merge into the Court of Chancery.

The step in the right direction has been taken to put an end to jobbing, and to improve a jurisdiction which is susceptible of improvement. We trust it will be carried out with energy, and we were glad to see that Mr. Osborne has nominated his Committee, and is prepared to act with promptitude. His selection of men and numbers was judicious: Mr. Osborne, Sir R. Peel, Sir J. Graham, Sir W.

Somerville, Sir J. Romilly, Mr. Napier, Mr. Mansell, Mr. Bright, Mr. Henly, Mr. O'Flaherty, Mr. G. A. Hamilton, Mr. M'Cullagh, Mr. Page Wood, Mr. Turner, Mr. Tebuent. Some of the latter-named gentlemen will not act, and their places will be filled by Irish members. We look to the evidence to be laid before this Committee and their Report with deep anxiety. The germ is deposited that may be productive of much practical good to Ireland. It has been a source of much gratification to us that we have, on all fitting occasions, reprobated the present system, laid bare its enormities, and given such suggestions as we conceived likely to be practically important; and our acknowledgments are due to Mr. Osborne for his too flattering testimony to our usefulness.

The remedies to be given to the judgment creditor involve questions of much difficulty, so that they may at once be certain, yet not oppressive—defined, yet not offering an insurmountable barrier to the transfer of property. This subject, as we have already glanced at, is a fit one for a jurist thoroughly acquainted with the laws and practice of Ireland. Can none such be found amongst the law officers of the Irish Government, or is all legislative activity—every legislative idea—to be transferred to English officials? If so, it is not to be wondered at that they will acquire, or have acquired, a profound contempt for the legal attainments of Irish lawyers.

To the Editor of the Irish Jurist.

SIR,

The course to be pursued on the occasion of supplying the vacancy in Parliament caused by the judgment against the late Member for the county of Limerick, (William Smith O'Brien,) seems not to have been clearly understood. The effect of final judgment after conviction of high treason is attainder, and, in legal phraseology, a party is then, but not before, said to be attainted of high treason, which was the proper term to have been applied on the occasion of moving for the issuing of a new writ to supply the vacancy, and not that which was made use of—viz., "adjudged guilty of high treason." The effect of attainder of high treason is, that all the rights of citizenship are forfeited, together with the life of the party; and the awful sentence of the law shews in what detestation and horror such a crime was held by our ancestors. It appears from the records of Parliament, that this crime has been more frequent amongst the members of the Upper House, Lord John Russell having adduced only two instances in the Lower House of motions similar to that he was the mover of. Peers, upon being attainted, at once lost all their dignity and other privileges, and even a pardon, which was the prerogative of the Sovereign, did not remove the attainder, but a Bill for this purpose should be passed in Parliament, as in the case of Lord Bolingbroke.

The idea, that though the Sovereign has an undisputed right to pardon any criminal, yet that there is not any right of commutation of the punishment, seems almost too absurd to take notice of. That such a power does exist, is a truth similar to those first principles which are self-evident, and yet which are difficult of proof. None will deny that a whole contains all its parts; and perhaps it may not a little startle the advocates of the absurd notion already spoken of, to learn that they do in fact deny this self-evident truth, for they affirm, that though the Sovereign may pardon in toto, she cannot in parte.

Your readers will remember the historical instances of commutation mentioned by Blackstone, under the title "Execution," Lord Coke and Sir Matthew Hale having held that the King could not change the punishment of the law by altering the hanging or burning into beheading, though when beheading was part of the sentence the King might remit the

Even in Lord Coke's time there were instances to the contrary, but he maintained with bull-dog ferocity, "Judicium est legibus non exemplis," upon which Foster remarks that the rule is true but the mistake in the application thereof, for inconvenient usage, founded on mercy and never complained of, is undoubtedly sufficient in this as in every other case to determine what is or is not part of the common law.

When Lord Stafford was executed for the Popish plot in the reign of Charles II, the sheriffs of London having received the writ for beheading him, petitioned the House of Lords for an order how the judgment should be executed, for being prosecuted by impeachment they entertained a notion (said to have been countenanced by Lord Russell,) that the King could not pardon any part of the sentence. The Lords resolved that the scruples of the sheriffs were unnecessary, and declared that the King's writ ought to be obeyed. The sheriffs signified to the House of Commons that they were not satisfied as to the power of said writ, and the House, after two days consideration, resolved that the House was content that the sheriff do execute Lord Stafford by severing his head from his body.

When Lord Russell was condemned for high treason upon indictment, the King, while he remitted the ignominious part of the sentence, observed, "That his Lordship would now find he was possessed of that prerogative which, in the case of Lord Stafford, he had denied him."

Our great commentator remarks, "One can hardly determine (at this distance from these turbulent times) which most to disapprove of, the indecent and sanguinary zeal of the subject, or the cool and cruel sarcasm of the sovereign." To my judgment it appears abundantly plain, that the sovereign, who is the fountain of mercy, can exercise a dispensing prerogative, and commute a heavier for a lighter punishment, "onere magis continet in se minus." The criminal has never yet been the person to raise the point; but it appears that one or two of the state prisoners have called in question the right to alter the sentence.

It is recorded as illustrative of the difference of character of James the Second, and William the Third, that the former, in allusion to an individual of his time, who was obnoxious to the government of the day, said "He is anxious to be a martyr, and I shall gratify him;" and William the Third, on a similar occasion—"He is anxious to be a martyr, and I shall disappoint him." Posterity has pronounced its approval of the latter sentiment, and I trust our government will adopt it, and disregard that morbid sense of vanity which would sacrifice life to its insane gratification.

10. That before any such licence as aforesaid shall be granted, a requisition for the same, in such form as the said commissioners shall from time to time appoint for that purpose, and accompanied with such certificate as hereinbefore is required, shall be made and signed by the person by whom such licence shall be required, and in every such requisition all such particulars as the said commissioners shall require shall be truly set forth; and every person applying for or attempting to procure any such licence, who shall make or cause to be made any false representation in regard to any of the said particulars, or who shall endeavour to obtain a licence by any forged recommendations, or who shall not truly answer all questions which shall be demanded of him in relation to such application for a licence, and also every person to whom reference shall be made who shall in regard to such application wilfully and knowingly make any misrepresentation, shall forfeit for every such offence a sum not exceeding forty shillings; and it shall be lawful for the said commissioners to proceed for recovering of such penalty before any divisional justice at any time within one calendar month after the commission of the offence, or during the currency of the licence so improperly obtained.

11. That as often as any driver or conductor shall change his place of abode he shall give notice thereof in writing signed by him to the said commissioners, specifying in such notice his new place of abode, and shall at the same time produce his licence to the said commissioners, who shall endorse thereon a memorandum specifying the particulars of such change; and every driver or conductor who shall change his place of abode, and shall neglect for two days to give notice of such change, and to produce his licence in order that such memorandum as aforesaid may be endorsed thereon, shall forfeit for every such offence a sum not exceeding forty shillings; and the said commissioners, or any person employed by them for that purpose, may sue for such penalty at any time during the currency of such licence.

12. That the particulars of every licence which shall be granted as aforesaid shall be entered in books to be kept for that purpose at the office of the said commissioners; and in all courts, and before any divisional justice of the peace, and upon all occasions whatsoever, a copy of any entry made in any such book, and certified by the person having the charge thereof to be a true copy, shall be received as evidence, and be deemed sufficient proof of all things therein registered, without requiring the production of the said book, or of any licence or of any requisition or other document upon which any such entry may be founded; and every person applying at all reasonable times shall be furnished with a certified copy of the particulars respecting any licensed person, without payment of any fee.

13. That every licensed driver or conductor shall at all times during his employment, and when he shall be required to attend before any divisional justice of the peace, wear his ticket conspicuously upon his breast in such manner that the whole of the writing thereon shall be distinctly legible; and every driver or conductor who shall, not as such, or who shall attend when required before any justice of the peace, without wearing such ticket in manner aforesaid, or who, when thereto required, shall refuse to produce such ticket for inspection, or to permit any person to note the writing thereon, shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of forty shillings.

14. That upon the expiration of any licence granted under this act the person to whom such licence shall have been granted shall deliver such licence and the ticket relating thereto to the said commissioners; and every such person who after the expiration of such licence shall wilfully neglect for three days to deliver the same to the said commissioners, and also every person who shall use or wear or detain any ticket, without having a licence in force relating to such ticket, or who shall, for the purpose of deception, use or wear or have any ticket resembling or intended to resemble any ticket granted under the authority of this act, shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding forty shillings; and it shall be lawful for the commissioners, or for any person employed by them for that purpose, to prosecute any person so neglecting to deliver up his licence or ticket, at any period within twelve calendar months after the expiration of the licence; and any constable or peace officer, or any person employed for that purpose by the commissioners, may seize and take away any such ticket, wheresoever the same may be found, in order to deliver the same to the said commissioners.

15. That whenever the writing on any ticket shall become obliterated or defaced so that the same shall not be distinctly legible, and also whenever any ticket shall be proved to the satisfaction of the said commissioners to have been lost or mislaid, the person to whom the licence relating to any such ticket shall have been granted shall deliver such ticket (if he shall have the same in his possession,) and shall produce such licence to the said commissioners, and such person shall then be entitled to have a new ticket delivered to him, upon payment of a sum of two shillings, to be applied as aforesaid: provided always, that if any ticket which shall have been proved as aforesaid or represented to have been lost or mislaid shall afterwards be found, the same shall forthwith be delivered to the said commissioners; and every person into whose possession any such ticket as last aforesaid shall be or come who shall refuse or neglect for three days to deliver the same to the said commissioners, and also every person licensed under the authority of this act who shall use or wear the ticket granted to him after the writing thereon shall be obliterated, defaced, or obscured so that the same shall not be distinctly legible, shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of forty shillings.

16. That every person who shall forge or counterfeit, or who shall cause or procure to be forged or counterfeited, any licence or ticket by this act directed to be provided for the driver of a hackney or other carriage as aforesaid, or for the driver or the conductor of a metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, and also every person who shall sell or exchange or expose to sale or utter any such forged or counterfeited licence or ticket, and also every person who shall knowingly, and without lawful excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused,) have or be possessed of such forged or counterfeited licence or ticket, knowing such licence or ticket to be forged or counterfeited, and also every person knowingly and wilfully aiding and abetting any person in committing any such offence as aforesaid, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being thereof convicted shall be liable to be punished by fine or imprisonment, or by both, such imprisonment to be in the common gaol or house of correction, and either with or without hard labour, as the court shall think fit; and any person may detain any such licence or ticket, or for any constable or peace officer, or any person employed for that purpose by the said commissioners, to seize and take away any such licence or ticket, in order that the same may be produced in evidence against such offender, or be disposed of as the said commissioners shall think proper.

17. That every proprietor of a hackney or other carriage as aforesaid, and of every metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, who shall permit and employ any licensed person to act as the driver or conductor thereof, shall require to be delivered to him and shall retain in his possession the licence of such driver or conductor while such driver or conductor shall remain in his service; and in all cases of complaint where the proprietor of a hackney or other carriage as aforesaid, or of a metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, shall be summoned to produce the driver or conductor of such carriage before a divisional justice of the peace, he shall also produce the licence of such driver or conductor, if at the time of receiving the summons such driver or conductor shall be in his service; and if any driver or conductor complained of shall be adjudged guilty of the offence alleged against him, the justice of the peace before whom he shall be convicted shall in every case award upon the licence of such driver or conductor the nature of the offence and the amount of the penalty inflicted; and every proprietor who shall neglect to require to be delivered to him and to retain in his possession the licence of any driver or conductor during such period as such driver or conductor shall remain in his service, or who shall refuse or neglect to produce such licence as aforesaid, shall for every such offence forfeit a sum not exceeding forty shillings.

18. That it shall be lawful for any such divisional justice to hear and determine all matters of complaint between any proprietor of a hackney or other carriage as aforesaid, or metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, and the driver or conductor of the same respectively, and to order payment of any sum of money that shall appear to be due to either party for wages or for the earnings in respect of any such carriage, or on account of any deposit of money, and to order compensation to the proprietor in respect of damage of any kind which shall have arisen through the neglect or default of any driver or conductor to the property of his employer, or trusted to his care, or in respect of any sum of money which such proprietor may have been lawfully ordered by a divisional justice of the peace to pay, and which has been actually paid pursuant to such order, on account of the negligent or wilful misconduct of his driver or conductor, and to award such compensation to either party in respect of any such matter of complaint between them as to such justice shall seem proper; and any money ordered to be paid as aforesaid may be recovered in like manner as any penalty under this act.

19. That it shall not be lawful, either in any court of law or before any divisional justice of the peace, to enforce the payment of any sum of money claimed from any driver or conductor by any proprietor on account of the earnings of any hackney carriage or other carriage as aforesaid, or metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, unless under an agreement in writing which shall have been signed by such driver or conductor in the presence of a competent witness; and no such agreement shall be liable to any stamp duty.

20. That when any licensed driver or conductor shall leave the service of any proprietor, such proprietor shall, upon demand thereof, return to him his licence: provided always, that if the said proprietor shall have any complaint against the said driver or conductor it shall be lawful for such proprietor to retain the licence for any time not exceeding twenty-four hours after the demand thereof, and within that time to apply to the police court of the district in which the said proprietor shall dwell, for a summons against him; and the said proprietor, at the time of applying for the summons, shall deposit the licence with the clerk of such police court or divisional justice; and in case any proprietor who, upon demand thereof, shall have refused or neglected to deliver to any driver or conductor his licence, shall not within twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sunday, or any day on which the police court shall not sit, apply for such summons, and deposit the licence as aforesaid, or shall not appear to prosecute his complaint at the time mentioned in the summons, it shall be lawful for such driver or conductor to apply to the same police court, or to some divisional justice as aforesaid, for a summons against such proprietor; and upon hearing and deciding the case, the justice, if he shall think there is no just cause for detaining the licence, or that there has been needless delay on the part of the proprietor in bringing the matter to a hearing, shall have power to order the said proprietor to pay such compensation to the said driver or conductor as the said justice shall think reasonable; and payment of such compensation shall be enforced in the same manner as any penalty may be enforced under the said revised act of the fifth year of her Majesty's reign; and the justice shall cause the licence to be delivered to the said driver or conductor, unless any misconduct shall be proved against him, by reason whereof the justice shall think that such licence shall be revoked or suspended; and so long as any proprietor shall neglect to apply for such summons and deposit the licence, after demand thereof, any divisional justice the peace may, in like manner, from time to time, order compensation to be paid by him to the same driver or conductor; and no proprietor shall, under any pretence, or by virtue of any claim whatever, retain beyond the time aforesaid the licence of his driver or conductor.

31. That it shall be lawful for any such divisional justice of the peace before whom any driver or conductor shall be convicted of any offence, whether under this act or any other act, if such justice, in his discretion, shall think fit, to revoke the licence of such driver or conductor, and also any other licence which he shall hold under the provisions of this act, or to suspend the same for such time as the justice shall think proper, and for that purpose to require the proprietor, driver, or conductor in whose possession such licence, and he ticket thereunto belonging, shall then be, to deliver up the same; and every proprietor, driver, or conductor, who, being so required, shall refuse or neglect to deliver up such licence and any such ticket or either of them, shall forfeit, on conviction as he shall be so required and refuse or neglect as aforesaid, a sum not exceeding forty shillings; and the justice shall forthwith send such licence and ticket to the commissioners, who shall cancel such licence, if it has been revoked by the justice, or if it has been suspended shall at the end of the time for which it shall have been suspended re-deliver such licence, with the ticket, to the person to whom it was granted.

32. That every driver or conductor authorized by any proprietor to act as driver of any hackney or other carriage as aforesaid, or as driver or conductor of any metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, who shall suffer any other person to act as driver of such hackney or other carriage, or as driver or conductor of such metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, without the consent of the proprietor thereof, and also every person, whether duly licensed or not, who shall act as driver or as conductor of any such carriage, without the consent of the proprietor thereof, shall forfeit the sum of forty shillings; and every driver or conductor charged with such offence, who, when required by a divisional justice of the peace as to do, shall not truly make known the name and place of abode of the person so suffered by him to act as driver or conductor without consent of the proprietor, and also the number of the ticket of such person (if licensed), shall be liable to a further penalty of forty shillings; and it shall be lawful for any police constable, without any warrant for that purpose, to take into custody any person unlawfully acting as a driver or as a conductor, and to convey him before any divisional justice of the peace, to be dealt with according to law, and also, if necessary, to take charge of the carriage and every horse in charge of such person, and to deposit the same in some place of safe custody until the same can be applied for by the proprietor.

33. That every driver of a hackney carriage or other carriage as aforesaid, or driver or conductor of a metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus, who shall be guilty of wanton or furious driving, or who by carelessness or wilful misbehaviour shall cause any hurt or damage to any person or property, being in any street or highway, and also every driver or conductor who, during his employment, shall be drunk, or shall make use of any insulting or abusive language, or shall be guilty of any insulting gesture or any misbehaviour, shall, for every such offence, forfeit a sum not exceeding forty shillings; or it shall be lawful for the justice before whom such complaint shall be brought, if in his discretion he shall think proper, instead of inflicting such penalty, forthwith to commit the offender to prison for any period not exceeding two calendar months, with or without hard labour, as the justice shall direct; and in every case where any such hurt or damage shall have been caused, the justice, upon the hearing of the complaint, may adjudge as and for compensation to any party aggrieved as aforesaid a sum not exceeding five pounds, and may order the proprietor of the hackney carriage or metropolitan stage carriage, the driver or conductor of which shall have caused such hurt or damage, forthwith to pay such sum, and also such costs as shall have been incurred, and payment thereof may be enforced against such proprietor as any penalty or sum of money may be recovered under and by virtue of this act; and any sum so paid by the proprietor shall be recovered in a summary way before a justice of the peace from the driver or conductor through whose default such sum shall have been paid upon proof of the payment thereof, or the justice may, in the first instance, adjudge the amount of such compensation to be paid by the driver or conductor to the party aggrieved.

34. That where there shall be more than one proprietor of any hackney or other carriage or metropolitan stage carriage or omnibus it shall be sufficient in any information, summons, order, conviction, warrant, or any proceeding under this act, or the 37 Geo. 3, to name such proprietors, and to describe and proceed against him as if he were sole proprietor.

35. That all complaints under this act may be heard and all penalties recovered by one or more justices as in the 5th Vic., and any divisional justice may, under this act, or the 37th Geo. 3, or any act amending same, or any rules or by-laws amending the same, lessen the penalty or time of imprisonment.

36. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

CAP. CXIV.

An Act to prevent District Auditors from taking Proceedings in certain Cases. [4th September, 1848.]

11. Penalty for using certificate for recovery of sums beyond the amount advanced by county trustees.

12. Treasurer may make allowances to officers of the trustees.

13. Dissolution of Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Institution.

14. Accounts to be made up annually, and laid before both houses of Parliament.

15. Public act.

16. Act may be amended. &c.

Whereas great distress prevailed in Ireland in the year 1822, and a committee of relief raised a sum of three hundred and eleven thousand and eighty-one pounds, five shillings, and seven pence, by subscription, for the suffering poor; and the said charitable association was subsequently carried on or superintended by such committee, or the board of directors under the name or style of "The Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Institution;" and whereas by an act passed in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of her Majesty, intitled, An Act to consolidate and amend the Laws for the Regulation of the Charitable Loan Societies in Ireland, certain things were enacted; and whereas the business of the said corporation cannot be continued with advantage to the public, and the said corporation have therefore agreed to surrender their charter, and that their funds and property and the debts owing to them should be vested in her Majesty, to be applied as hereinafter mentioned: be it enacted, that all the funds and property of the said corporation, and all funds and property vested in, and all debts due to any members, agents, or trustees of the said corporation, on behalf of the said corporation, subject as hereinafter mentioned, and also all funds and property of the said corporation vested in or under the control of any of the said local trustees or local committees or associations acting under them, or of any societies in connexion with the said corporation, and also all debts and sums of money due to the said corporation from any persons or person whomsoever, shall immediately after the passing of this act be vested in her Majesty, and shall and may be sued for and recovered in the name of her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or by and in the name of any person or persons appointed for that purpose by the Commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, or any three or more of them, by any such proceedings as may by law be adopted or used for recovering debts or demands due to any Loan Society in Ireland, freed however from the limitation as to amount recoverable in the said recited acts contained, or by such other proceedings at law or in equity as might have been adopted or used by the said corporation for recovering such debts, funds, property, and sums of money respectively in case this act had not been passed.

2. That any such funds or monies belonging to the said corporation which have been or may be paid over to her Majesty's treasury, and all such other monies as which under this act shall be recovered or received from any party or parties in Ireland, shall be applied and disposed of for such charitable purposes or objects applied and disposed of for such charitable purposes or objects of public utility not otherwise provided for in whole or in part by local rate or assessment, including the instruction in and the promotion of agricultural science, in the several counties of Leitrim, Sligo, Roscommon, Mayo, Galway, Clare, Limerick, Tipperary, Cork, and Kerry, in Ireland, as the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor of Ireland, with the consent of her Majesty's treasury, or any three of them, shall direct and appoint, but so that the sums already recovered, and hereafter to be recovered from each county of the monies originally appropriated thereto, as shewn in the Schedule (D.) to this act annexed, and profits which have accumulated or may hereafter accumulate thereon, shall be applied to such purposes within such respective county; provided that the sum of five thousand pounds, which as appears by accounts laid before parliament was specifically appropriated for the establishment of an agricultural school of industry in the province of Munster, shall be received out of the said fund to be applied in aid of local funds for the establishing an agricultural school or schools in that province, in such manner as the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with the approval of the Lords of the Treasury, shall direct, such sum to be applied, so far as possible, in aid of contributions locally collected for the same purpose.

3. That the said corporation, within three calendar months after the passing of this act, may apply so much of the said sums, mentioned in the said schedule (A.) as now constituting the fund appropriated for defraying expenses as aforesaid, as shall be necessary, in paying the debts, liabilities, and expenses of the said corporation, and such compensations to persons now or heretofore employed by or under the said corporation, or the said association before the incorporation thereof, as the said corporation shall think reasonable, which said compensations may be made either by payment of sums of money, or by the purchase of annuities, or otherwise; and the said corporation shall within the said three calendar months deliver to the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury the bond mentioned in the said schedule, or such amount of principal and interest as shall have been paid thereon, and transfer and pay over to the said commissioners the balance of the several sums of stock and money mentioned in the schedule (A.) or of other the sums of stock and money which at the time of the passing of this act shall form the property of the said corporation, exclusively of so much of the said balances or sums of money, and of the money owing on the said bond, which shall not have been realized by the said corporation, together with all vouchers, books, accounts, and papers now under their control and custody, and relating in any way to the said charity or any portion of the funds under the control and management of the said corporation, except such vouchers, accounts, and papers as the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, or any three or more of them, shall think fit to leave in the possession of the trustees and local committees as being necessary to enable such trustees and local associations to collect the funds intrusted to them respectively; and upon such transfer, payment, and delivery by the said corporation, and all the present and former governors and members thereof, and all the several persons who at any time members of the committee of relief or charitable association in London previously to the date of the said aforesaid, or of the board of directors of the said charitable association in London, and their respective estates, shall be fully released and discharged from all claims and demands and all liability whatsoever by or to Her Majesty's treasury, or any persons or person whatever, for or in respect of any matter or thing whatsoever connected with or arising out of the said corporation, or the said committee of relief or charitable association, or the funds or property of the said corporation, or any funds or property whatever intrusted in or received by the said committee of relief or charitable association, or any members or member, agent or servants thereof, or for or in respect of any matter or thing whatsoever connected with the premises.

4. That nothing herein contained shall release the trustees in the said several counties in Ireland from any liability in respect of the moneys intrusted to them respectively out of the funds vested in the governors of the said corporation, and any obligation to collect and enforce payment thereof, and of the accumulations thereof, as such trustees respectively would have been subject to, in case this act had not been passed; and the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, or any three or more of them, may from time to time appoint any person or persons to collect and receive from such trustees, or from the party or parties liable to pay the same, such of the monies hereby vested in her Majesty as may be payable by such trustees or other parties respectively; and the said local committees, associations, or other borrowers shall continue liable to the said trustees in the same manner and to the same extent as if this act had not been passed, and the bye laws and regulations made, established, or continued under the authority of the said charter, so far as the same are consistent with this act, shall continue to be obligatory on the said trustees and the said local committees or associations respectively, in the same manner and to the same extent as if this act had not been passed, but no further, but so nevertheless that so much recovered or received by the said trustees or the said local committees or associations shall be re-issued or advanced on loan, except such amounts or portions of the sums repaid as may be sanctioned by the governors of the said corporation within three months from the passing of this act, or may be hereafter sanctioned by the Commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, or by such persons or persons as the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury may appoint to receive the monies hereby vested in her Majesty.

5. That notwithstanding the dissolution of the said corporation, any of the said county trustees in Ireland, or any local committees, associations, or parties acting under any of the said trustees in Ireland having had notice before the passing of this act, by virtue or in respect of connexion with the said Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Institution, or by virtue or in respect of connexion with any of the said county trustees thereof, or having had notice before the passing of this act, with the sanction of the governors of the said corporation, within such three months as aforesaid, or with the sanction of the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, or of such persons or persons as they may appoint to receive the monies hereby vested in her Majesty, may use and exercise the powers, authorities, rights, and remedies contained and provided in any act or acts for the regulation of charitable Loan Societies in Ireland for the recovery of monies, and subject to like provisions or any means or remedies provided by law for the recovery of debts, unless the proceedings for the recovery of such monies shall at any time be directed by the said Commissioners of her Majesty's treasury to be appended.

6. And whereas by the 6 & 7 Vic. and 7 & 8 Vic. such certificate as in the said acts mentioned is made evidence of the facts therein certified: be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this act a certificate given in the form prescribed in the schedule marked (B) to this act annexed, signed by any three persons professing to be trustees of the funds heretofore belonging to the said corporation in and for the county in which any such local committee, association, or party acting under the said trustees shall have lent such monies or taken any securities, shall be evidence in like manner and be of like force as a certificate under the corporate seal of the said corporation would have been under the said recited acts or either of them, and it shall not be necessary to prove that any person signing such certificate as a trustee shall be a trustee as aforesaid.

7. That all trustees of the funds heretofore belonging to the said corporation who shall give any certificate under the provision herein-before contained shall forthwith after giving every such certificate convene a meeting of the trustees according to the bye-laws regulating such meetings, and shall notify to such meeting the issuing of such certificate, and shall transmit to the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury a duplicate or copy of such certificate, signed by the trustees who shall have issued the same, and by the chairman of such meeting; and the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury may from time to time cause a list, description, or specification of the trustees of the funds heretofore vested in the said corporation, and of the associations or loan societies or institutions heretofore established in Ireland by or in connexion with the said corporation, who shall remain in possession of any money heretofore belonging or accruing from the monies belonging to the corporation, and vested in her Majesty by this act, to be sent to the secretary to the loan fund board in Dublin; and such list, description, or specification so sent shall have the same force and effect as the list, description, or specification which by the said act of the sixth and seventh years of the reign of Her present Majesty was required to be sent by the said Irish reproductive loan fund institution to the said secretary of the loan fund board in Dublin.

8. That within three months after the passing of this act all such trustees as aforesaid in and for any county, and all such local committees, associations, or other parties acting under any such trustees, holding securities for any such funds or moneys lent as aforesaid, except such as shall have been lent by the trustees to associations or to parties to re-lend, shall and are hereby required to deposit with the clerk of the peace for such respective county duplicate lists of all such loans and securities, and the amount then due thereon respectively, according to the form marked (C.) in the schedule annexed to this act; and the said trustees, local associations, or other parties acting under such trustees as aforesaid, making loans after the passing of this act, with the sanction of the governors, or of the said commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, or with the sanction of the parties who may be appointed as aforesaid by the said commissioners, shall and are hereby required to transmit to the clerk of the peace, within seven days from the granting of such loans, according to the same form, so far as the same is applicable; and all such duplicate lists as aforesaid shall be duly certified by the inspector to such trustees; and in every case such clerk of the peace is hereby required to take charge of and retain one of such lists, and to transmit the other of such lists, within two days after the receipt thereof, to the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury: provided always, that all loans and moneys to be recovered in manner herein-before provided shall be included in such lists as aforesaid respectively.

9. That when any such county trustees as aforesaid shall have advanced any such funds or moneys as aforesaid to any local committee, association, or party acting under them, for the purpose of re-lending the same, and shall have received back from such local committee, association, or party the moneys so advanced, the said trustees shall, within forty-eight hours after the receipt thereof, notify in writing to the clerk of the peace of such county such receipt, and the discharge of such debt or advance as mentioned in any such certificate marked (B.) in the said schedule annexed to this act; and such clerk of the peace, on receipt of such notification, shall forthwith notify the same in writing to the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, and also to the justices of the peace at the petty sessions for the district or districts next adjoining the place where such local committee, association, or party has been acting as aforesaid.

10. That any person not being a trustee, who shall as a trustee sign any such certificate as aforesaid, and any such trustee or trustees as aforesaid giving any false certificate under this act, or not giving notice as aforesaid to the respective clerk of the peace of the payment and discharge of any such loan or advance made to any such local committee, association, or party acting under such trustees, shall be liable to forfeit four times the amount of the sum specified in such certificate, one half to the informer, and the other half to her Majesty, and to be recovered by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, or by proceedings in a summary way before any justice or justices of the peace, in like manner and subject to like provisions as any penalty or forfeiture may be recovered under the 6 & 7 Vic.

11. That if any trustee or trustees, or any member or members of any local committee or association or party acting under any such trustees as aforesaid, shall proceed to recover any moneys lent out by them respectively beyond the amount of the aggregate sum advanced to them by any such county trustees as aforesaid, and the accumulations by the profits derived from the interest, fines, and charges paid thereon by borrowers thereof, and for such purpose shall use any certificate or other evidence of connexion with the said corporation, or any such certificate of a trustee or trustees as in this act provided, every such trustee or trustees or member of a local committee or association or party so offending, shall forfeit the amount of such demand so sought to be recovered, and shall likewise be subject to the further penalty of four times the amount of such demand, one half thereof to be paid to the informer, and one half to Her Majesty, and such penalty to be recovered in the manner herein-before provided as to penalties above mentioned; provided that such penalty hereby inflicted shall not exonerate such party or parties from any penalties he or they may incur to be paid to the loan fund board in Ireland.

12. That it shall be lawful for the said commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury, out of the moneys vested in Her Majesty by this act, to allow any secretaries or other persons heretofore employed by the said trustees such allowance in respect of length of service or other meritorious cause, and also to pay to such persons as may be from time to time employed by or with the sanction of the said commissioners, in collecting, managing, and applying, or otherwise in relation to the funds hereby vested in Her Majesty, such salaries or allowances as the said commissioners shall think fit.

13. That after the expiration of three calendar months from and after the passing of this act the said corporation of the Irish reproductive loan fund institution shall be dissolved to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

14. That an annual account showing the receipts and disbursements under this act shall be made up to and for the 31st of December in every year, and shall be laid before both houses of Parliament within ten days of their next sitting by the lords commissioners of the treasury.

15. That this act shall be deemed a public act, and shall be taken notice of as such in all courts whatsoever.

16. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of parliament.

DUBLIN, JUNE 23, 1849.

A CASE of much practical importance to solicitors was recently the subject of adjudication in the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Leringe v. De Montmorancy, (not yet reported.) A petition was presented on behalf of the receiver in the cause, that the solicitor should deposit certain deeds in his possession in Court, for the purposes of the suit, and to enable the receiver to bring ejectments; and was resisted on the part of the solicitor, on the ground that if the deeds left his possession his lien was gone, and could not be transferred to any fund that would be realized in the cause; that even assuming the right to resist production could not be maintained against the party moving for it, every other party in the cause would incidentally gain thereby, to the prejudice of the solicitor, as the character of an incumbrance, the result of a contract, does not belong to the lien of a solicitor; and for this position the cases of Blunden v. Desart, (2 Dru. & Warren, 405,) Taylor v. Gorman, (6 L. E. R. 339,) and Bason v. Bolland, (4 M. & Cr. 354,) were cited.

In Bason v. Bolland, the solicitor had been discharged by his client, the plaintiff in the cause. During the progress of the cause, costs had become due to him, as well in that as in other matters in which he had been also employed. The solicitor produced the deed, through which he sought to establish his lien, as evidence in the cause; he subsequently became bankrupt; and his assignee presented a petition claiming a lien on the fund in the cause, for the benefit of which the deed was in Court, for the entire of the costs incurred in the cause and otherwise, and contended, that as the title to the fund was established by the production of that deed, he was therefore entitled to the same lien upon the fund he was entitled to upon the deed. The Lord Chancellor Cottenham decided that the assignees of the solicitor were entitled to payment out of the funds in the cause alone.

In Blunden v. Desart, (Flan. & Kel. 572,) before Sir M. O'Loughlin, the lien of the solicitor was upheld, under the following facts:—Mr. Maxwell was the solicitor of Sir J. Blunden; from the year 1800 till 1805, different title-deeds relating to Sir John's estates came into his possession. In 1812, costs became due to the solicitor. In 1815, a judgment was recovered against Sir John Blunden, and further costs were incurred from that period to the death of Sir John, in 1818. An order having been made in the cause of Blunden v. Desart, that the solicitor of the late Sir John should furnish his costs, the Master reported under that order, that £1544 17s. 10d. was due to the solicitor. On the 27th of June, an order was made—Maxwell, the solicitor, "not objecting thereto"—that he should lodge in the Master's office all the title-deeds, relating to the lands decreed to be sold, in his power or possession, and without prejudice to such lien as he might establish against the funds in the cause. The Master, in allocating the funds, reported the solicitor's demand to be in priority to creditors whose claims were subsequent to 1812. The assignee of the judgment of 1815 objected to this report, and Sir M. O'Loughlin upheld the report of the Master. This case came by way of appeal before Sir E. Sugden, C. (2, D. & W. Judgment, 422,) who reversed the order of the Master of the Rolls as far as regarded the costs incurred subsequent to the judgment of 1815.

The next case relied upon as unfavourable to the lien of a solicitor who has parted with the possession of his client's papers, is that of Taylor v. Gorman, (6 Ir. Eq. Rep. 330,) before Mr. Blackburne, M. R., the present Lord Chief Justice. In that case, the solicitor of the defendant, in 1819, obtained possession of several deeds relating to the estates of the defendants, and on which he claimed a lien. These deeds he brought into Court, under an order in the cause, the lodgment to be without prejudice to such lien as he had thereon. There was a mortgage of 1777 on the lands which these papers related to, and claims on behalf of younger children, prior to 1819. Subject to these prior demands the Master found that the solicitor had a lien on the papers in Court, and that he was entitled to be paid in priority the portion of the several costs incurred by him prior to the rendition of certain judgments affecting the estate of the defendant.

The suit was instituted to carry into effect the trusts of a deed by which the defendant conveyed certain estates to trustees for the payment of his debts, to which deed the solicitor was a party. In his judgment, (p. 333,) the Master of the Rolls says—"The solicitor having parted with the deed, it is argued that his right is transferred to the fund, and that, the estate being sold and the prior mortgage paid, he is, in place of the lien he has lost, to be paid out of the surplus of the funds realized by the sale." He then goes on—"This claim is at variance with the nature of the right which the lien on the deed confers, and is repudiated by Lord Cottenham in Boson v. Bolland. "The solicitor's claim on the fund," he observes, "has been called transferring the lien from the document to the fund recovered by its production; but there is no transfer, for the lien on the deed remains as before, although perhaps of no value; and whereas the lien on the deed could never have been actually enforced, the lien on the fund, if established, would give a title to payment out of it." The solicitor, to get rid of the difficulties those arguments create, has endeavoured to found his right on the decree or order, as amounting to a recognition of a right to be paid out of the fund, but they have no effect save that of preserving his right, if right he had, to get back the deed, and cannot be argued to have altered the nature and character of that right, substituting for it actual payment of his demand." This decision was confirmed on appeal by Sir E. Sugden, C. (7 Ir. Eq. Rep. 259.)

These cases have been generally considered by the profession as authorities for the position—that by parting with the possession of the deeds, even under the order of the court, the solicitor in every case virtually lost his lien upon the deeds in his possession, inasmuch as, according to the view taken by the Master of the Rolls in Taylor v. Gorman, that lien was not transferred to the fund; and the possession being parted with, the lien which it was admitted by the court still attached to the papers, became valueless, though being one which, if the analogy between this and other instances of lien be correct, would revive upon re-possession. Hartley v. Hitchcock, (8 Taunt. 149.)

The doctrine upon which the lien of a solicitor on the papers of his client, which have properly come to his possession rests, is founded upon the plainest principles of justice, and, in the abstract, is one upon which no difficulty can arise. The rule is settled beyond question, that if a client discharge his solicitor, the court will not take the papers from the latter, unless upon payment of his bill. To travel through the infinity of decisions on this subject, or reconcile them, would not be, perhaps, possible, and the attempt would be beyond the limits of our present enquiry; but it will be found on examination to be generally true, that in every case where the court has denied the solicitor's claim upon the fund, it was either on the ground that no lien existed, or there were circumstances amounting to a waiver of it.

The solicitor having obtained possession of the deeds, has a right to retain them, and it would certainly appear to be contrary to the principles of justice, which first gave that right, that the court, by ordering the production of the deeds, should deprive him of it, if it be unaffected by any indemnity. And, as we heard Mr. Baron Richards observe, in the case which led us to these observations, it would be monstrous to say, that if a solicitor have a lien against a subsequent creditor, that a prior creditor should be deprived of the means of getting at the deeds for the purpose of his suit; and that if the court had not the power of getting possession of the deeds, and of preserving the rights of the solicitors in their integrity, that the whole cause should be paralyzed.

The solicitor for the defendant, Montmercy, resisted the application for the production of the deeds; his counsel citing the cases referred to, to shew the prejudicial effect the production would have upon his rights, and relied upon his right to retain possession till paid.

The court held there was a marked distinction between those cases where the solicitor voluntarily produces the deed, and where the court makes the order in invitum. Mr. Baron Pennefather, observing on the case of Taylor v. Gorman, said, that though the observations of the Master of the Rolls went to the length of the proposition they were cited to maintain, that the Lord Chancellor had upheld that decision on a different ground—holding that the solicitor, by executing the deed of 1894, had waived his lien; but that he could not be understood as deciding that, if the order was in invitum, the court could not protect the interest of the solicitor.

The court directed the deeds to be brought in without prejudice to the attorney's lien, if any he have, or against the puisne creditors making a special reservation as to the rights of the attorney—Mr. Baron Pennefather concluding by saying that he by no means thought such a reservation necessary, as in his opinion the ordinary order to bring in the deeds without prejudice would be sufficient.

The case of Boson v. Bolland which was raised upon by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment in Taylor v. Gorman, was also, it was observed by the court, within this principle, the solicitor having voluntarily produced the deed. Lord Cottenham, in that case, held that the solicitor having produced the deed voluntarily, was entitled to be paid the costs in that suit alone in which it was produced, and that by the production he disentitled himself to that lien for his general balance which he previously had.

Worrall v. Johnson, (2 Jac. & W. 214), before Sir Thomas Plumer, M. R., was observed upon by Lord Cottenham in Baxon v. Bolland, and he appeared to doubt its authority as to the question whether the solicitor was entitled to be paid his general balance, or merely those arising in the suit in which the fund was realized. But there appears to be this plain distinction between the two cases—in the latter the voluntary production having destroyed the general lien, the particular one on the funds in the cause only remained. The Chancellor, p. 357, says, "It appears to me, that in these observations, (referring to those of Sir T. Plumer in Worrall v. Johnson), the distinction between the solicitor's lien upon the fund realised in the cause, and his lien upon, or rather right to retain his client's papers in his hands, as solicitor, is not sufficiently kept in view. The lien upon the fund realized in the suit is confined to the costs of that suit, Lease v. Church, (4 Madd. 391,) although that seemed to be doubted in Worrall v. Johnson." These observations of the Lord Chancellor appear to have been made without attentively considering the report of Worrall v. Johnson, which appears to us to confirm, rather than clash with the opinion of Lord Cottenham—the lien being upon the papers, which, it is clear from the judgment of the court, the solicitor had never lost possession of. At p. 218, Sir T. Plumer adverts to the distinction which Lord Cottenham thought to be not sufficiently attended to. "There are two kinds of lien that a solicitor has for a bill of costs—one on the fund recovered, and the other on the papers in his hands;" and at p. 219—"It is of no consequence there is a compromise here—the fund cannot be transferred without as application to the court; and the other parties would then object, unless the deed be given back to them; and it cannot be got at, except from the solicitor. The plaintiff's assignee can therefore never succeed, without applying for the possession of it;"—evidently shewing the demand of the solicitor was on account of the general lien on the papers, which, being in his possession, in the language of Lord Cottenham in Baxon v. Bolland, "he had a right to withhold, and, if essential to the client, might, by those means, compel payment of his general professional demand." This proposition must, however, be taken with this qualification, that no person has a title to the papers superior to that of the client. In Mollesworth v. Robins, (3 Jon. & Mat. 358), Sir E. Sugden in his judgment, p. 370, after saying "that a solicitor to enforce his lien, can only withhold the deed, so as to prevent the party entitled having the benefit of them," goes on "but no man can give a lien to a solicitor of a higher nature than the interest he himself has in the deed. The client had no right to charge the deed which did not belong to him alone, but to himself in common with others, and which he could not withhold from the class of persons entitled to them."

These authorities go far to support the view of the Court of Exchequer in Levings v. De Montmercy. They shew the very high nature of the rights accorded to the solicitor for his protection—the injustice of depriving him of that right we have already adverted to. The proper course for every solicitor whose lien is sought to be interfered with, will be, to dissent to the production of the deed—to act on his strict right of retainer—and in this manner compel the parties requiring the benefit of the papers, either to purchase that benefit by the settlement of the whole costs due, or by driving them to the necessity of an application to the court to compel their production, obtain, as in this case, a full protection—a course recommended by Sir E. Sugden in Taylor v. Gorman, who, after adverting to the hardship inflicted upon the solicitor in the case before him, adds, "that he should be cautious never to enter into such an arrangement as existed there—that his course should be to call upon the court to decide the question of lien."

To the Editor of the Irish Jurist.

MR. EDITOR—Whoever has read the recent debates in the House of Commons, on the subject of the sale of incumbered estates in Ireland, cannot but be struck with the feeling of discontent exhibited, that so little has been done to diminish the delay and expense of the procedure in the Court of Chancery. To describe the Court of Chancery as an unwieldy engine, costly in its working, and tardy in its movements, seemed to be the ambition of every member who addressed the house, while the annals of bygone litigation have been ransacked for the purpose of amusing the house with the story of some unhappy purchaser under that court, who afterwards finds himself embarked in a sea of litigation, and shipwrecked in the end. In this state of feeling, the project for taking the sale of incumbered estates from the Court of Chancery, and entrusting it to government commissioners, was introduced into the house, and passed almost without opposition. Now, while I freely admit that greater facilities should be given for the transfer of land, and that although a good deal has of late been effected, yet that many improvements might still be made in our judicial proceedings, I would altogether deprecate the system of modern legislation, which, in the rage for novelty, endeavours to discover some new machinery for the working of each specific case, rather than improve the old, which is so well adapted for all.

The Court of Chancery has been in existence for centuries; the excellencies of its system, and the impediments to its working, are now well understood. Some of the greatest men that ever lived have left upon it the impress of their characters; and surely it would be much wiser to remove whatever has been found to clog the working of this wondrous machine, than to substitute for it the weak inventions of modern theorists, whose patch-work devices, if found to work at all, would require much time to be understood, and a long series of judicial decisions to consolidate, before they could be reduced into a system of practice.

Now, to apply these observations to the object which appears to be so desired, of selling the estates of incumbered proprietors in Ireland, it would not be difficult to shew, that by giving increased powers to the Court of Chancery in a few particulars, estates could be sold by this court with as much expedition, more economy, and with far greater safety to the parties interested, than by the proposed new machinery, or almost any other that could be invented. To make this intelligible to some readers, let me observe, that the delay in the sale of estates through the court of Chancery, arises from two causes. The first is, that by the present practice the sale is not made until the end of the suit, after the rights of all the parties has been adjudicated upon, and the sum due to each ascertained. The second is, that after the sale is made, it is now necessary to trace the title of the party whose estate is decreed to be sold. But let these two impediments be removed, and any estate might be sold through the Court of Chancery, within three months after the application to it for that purpose is made. For instance, there exists in Ireland more statistical information respecting land, than, we believe, in any other country in the world. First, there is the ordnance survey, which gives the value, or the approximate value of every estate in the country. Second, there is the registry office, where an abstract of every deed creating any limitation or charge, can be had. Thirdly, there is the new office for the registry of judgments, established by Sir Edward Sugden, where, at a glance, any one that pleases, can see every judgment that has been entered up against any individual in the community. Suppose, then, that an incumbrancer desires to have an estate sold; let him file a short bill or present a short petition, succinctly stating the nature of his own incumbrance, the value of the estate, as appearing from the Ordinance Survey, and the amount of the other charges or incumbrances that appear to affect it, (which, for greater conciseness, could be done by referring to a schedule, to be affixed to the bill or petition, giving merely the dates, sums, and parties' names connected with each charge;) and then, after serving all parties with notice, let him be at liberty to set down the cause or matter to be heard before the Lord Chancellor, who upon receiving proof by a witness, visu voce, at the hearing, of the plaintiff's or petitioner's incumbrance, and being satisfied of the genuineness of the other charges, and that the plaintiff or petitioner has in fact the right to sell the estate, should be at liberty to pronounce a decree for a sale at once; and at the same time direct that the purchaser is to have a parliamentary title, and to be put into possession of the estates immediately upon lodging his purchase-money in Court; and thenceforward be freed from all the future litigation in the suit connected with the claims of the various incumbrancers or parties interested, whose demands are to be transferred from the estate sold to the purchase-money in Court, which represents it. After the fund is brought into Court, the usual allocation order could be made, referring it to the Master in the cause, to report the rights and priorities of the several incumbrancers, and to allocate the fund amongst them accordingly. By what new machinery could a sale be effected so cheaply or expeditiously? What more perfect system could be invented? And yet, all this is to be superseded, and new Judges, together with their hosts of secretaries, clerks, and other officials, are to be sent over from England, to make new rules and orders, and to sell the estates of incumbered proprietors in Ireland, where there is for that purpose so great an establishment, and so perfect a system already in existence.

Fearing on this occasion to trespass too much on your space, I will, with your permission, again refer to this important subject.

An act to explain and amend the law as to the licences required for the letting of post horses to hire in Ireland, and the law respecting proceedings for duties and penalties under the post horse, stage, and hackney carriage acts in the united Kingdom.

[4th September, 1848.]

CAP. CXIX.

An act to simplify the forms of certificates under the act authorizing the advance of money for the improvement of land by drainage in Great Britain.

[4th September, 1848.]

CAP. CXX.

An act to facilitate the transfer of landed property in Ireland.

[4th September, 1848.]

- Sec. 1. Registrar of Deeds, &c., previous to giving out any Negative Search, to cause a Copy to be recorded in Registry Office.
2. Books containing Copies of Negative Searches to be numbered, and Number and Page of Book to be endorsed on original Search.
3. Indexes to be provided for the Books containing Copies of Negative Searches. Power to search Books on payment of fee.
4. Attested Copies of recorded Searches to be given by Registrar, &c., upon payment of fee.
5. Such Copy to be equivalent to a new Search to the same extent.
6. Fees to be accounted for as under Act for regulating Registry Office.
7. Power to Treasury to alter the forms of Indexes of Names and Lands directed by 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 87.
8. Power to Treasury to direct Expenses consequent upon this Act to be defrayed out of Balances in Registrar's hands.
- Power to demand Fees as specified in the Schedule to this act.
10. Registrar of Judgments, upon production of certificate of satisfaction of judgment, to enter memorandum thereof upon entry of Registry.
11. Court, &c., by whom Decree has been pronounced shall direct Officer to give certificate thereof, and record same. In case Decree has been registered under 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105., or under 7 & 8 Vic. c. 91., a Memorandum to be annexed to the entry of Registry.
12. No Judgment, &c., to be registered until certificate of the existence of such judgment, &c., has been lodged with Registrar.
13. Crown Bonds and Recognizances more than twenty years old not to affect Purchasers or Mortgagees, unless redated in the office of Registrar of Judgments.
14. Power to Treasury to consolidate Offices.
15. Act may be amended, &c.

Whereas it is expedient to afford further facilities for the transfer of landed property in Ireland, by diminishing the expense of registry searches, and otherwise: be it enacted, that the registrar of deeds and the registrar of judgments in Ireland for the time being shall and they are hereby required, previous to giving out of said office any negative search, to cause a copy of such negative search to be entered on parchment in books to be provided for the purpose and to be kept in their offices respectively among the records thereof.

2. That every book wherein any such copy of a negative search and certificate shall be entered shall be numbered otherwise distinguished in some appropriate and convenient manner, and the pages of each such book shall be numbered, and the number or other distinctive mark of every such book and the number or numbers of the page or pages therein wherein any such negative search and certificate shall be copied, shall be specified at foot of the certificate, signed by the registrar or assistant registrar in manner following (that is to say,) "Copied in Book, No. Page Number

3. That the said registrars shall respectively cause sufficient index or sufficient indexes to be prepared, in such form as the commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury shall direct, to the books containing the copies of searches made pursuant to this act; and in such indexes shall be entered, in some convenient manner for reference, the names or names of some one or more of the persons whose acts such negative search shall relate to; and that the said registrar of deeds shall also cause to be prepared another sufficient index or other sufficient indexes to the said books, containing the said copies of the said negative searches, in such form as the said commissioners of Her Majesty's treasury for the time being, or any three of them, shall from time to time direct, wherein shall be entered, in some convenient form for reference, the name or names of some one or more of the denominations of land mentioned in the requisition for such negative search; and all persons shall be at liberty to search the said books on payment of the fee mentioned in the schedule hereunto annexed.

4. That every person shall be entitled to an attestation of any search so recorded, or any portion thereof, upon payment of the fees mentioned in the schedule hereunto annexed, and the registrar or assistant registrar of deeds and registrar of judgments in Ireland for the time being, upon being furnished with a specific requisition, shall cause to be delivered to the person making such requisition a stated copy of every such recorded negative search, or the portion thereof in such requisition mentioned; and all the powers and liabilities to which such registrars and assistant registrars are liable in respect of fraud, collusion, or neglect in making the original searches and certificates shall extend to the attested copies to be given under this act.

5. That every such attested copy of every such recorded negative search and certificate, so signed as aforesaid, shall have the same force and effect, and shall be accepted and received in the same manner and for the said purposes, as an original negative search or certificate to the same extent and in the same terms.

6. That the fees payable to the said registrar of deeds and registrar of judgments under this act shall be deemed and taken to be part of the fees payable to them under the acts for the regulation of their respective offices, and shall be applied and accounted for according to the provisions of said acts.

7. And whereas by the 2 & 3 W. 4. c. 87, it was provided that alphabetical indexes of the names of the persons and of the lands affected by the memorials registered in said office should be made and kept in the manner and according to the form particularly specified in said act: and whereas the making of searches in said office may be facilitated by alterations in the form of such indexes: be it enacted, that the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury may make any alterations in the forms of the indexes of names and lands directed by said recited act to be made, and to order that a sufficient index or indexes shall be prepared to the several books in the office of the said registrar of judgments; and from the time of making any such order, or from any time to be specified therein, the said indexes shall be made and kept in such manner and form as the said commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, or any three of them, shall in such order, specify and direct; and the said commissioners in like manner may vary or rescind any such order as aforesaid.

8. That the said commissioners may order and direct that any expenses which may appear to them to be requisite for or to be necessarily and properly incurred in carrying the purposes of this act into effect shall be defrayed out of the balances on the accounts of the said registrars in respect of the said register of offices, or in such other manner as the said commissioners shall think fit to direct.

9. That for and in respect of the entries, endorsements, certificates, and other matters or acts hereby directed or required to be performed, the officers discharging said duties shall respectively be entitled to demand and receive the several fees specified in the schedule to this act annexed, which schedule, and all directions therein contained, shall be deemed and taken to be part of this act; and the said commissioners, by order under their hands, from time to time may alter and vary the fees specified in the said schedule, and to substitute other fees therefor.

10. ' And whereas by the 7 & 8 Vic. c. 90, provision was made for the registry in the office created by such act, and called "the Judgment office," of all judgments of the superior courts of common law, and of crown bonds and recognizances, and of all decrees, rules, and orders which, under the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, had the force and effect of judgments of the superior courts of common law, in order to make same binding as against purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, but no sufficient provision was made by said recited act for the registry in said office of the satisfaction of judgments, crown bonds or recognizances, decrees, rules, or orders registered therein: be it enacted that the registrar of judgments shall, upon the lodgment with him of a certificate of the entry of satisfaction upon the roll of any judgment of any of the superior courts of common law which may have been registered under said recited act, or which may appear upon the books of revivals and redocketings which, under the provisions of said recited act, were transferred to said registrar, signed by the proper officer of such superior court of common law, or upon the lodgment with him of the certificate of the cancelling or vacate of any bond or recognizance to the Crown, signed by the proper officer in that behalf, and which certificate such officers are hereby authorized and required respectively to give, cause a memorandum of such satisfaction, cancelling, or vacate to be subscribed into the entry of the registry of such judgment, or of the revival or re-docketing thereof, or of such crown bond or recognizance, specifying the date at which such satisfaction, cancelling or vacate appears by such certificate to have been entered on record, and shall sign such memorandum, and shall, if required, endorse upon a duplicate of such certificate a minute, stating that such memorandum has been entered as aforesaid; and upon every search made in the said judgment office subsequently to the entry of such memorandum as aforesaid, whereon such judgment, crown bond or recognizance shall appear, the entry of such memorandum shall be stated.

11. That from and after the passing of this act every court judge, commissioner, or other person by whom any decree, rule or order has been or shall be pronounced or made, which, under the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, has the force and effect of a judgment, upon its being made to appear to them or him that such decree, rule or order has been fully performed, complied with, or satisfied, shall direct the proper officer to give a certificate thereof, and record the same in his office; and in case said decree, rule or order shall have been or shall be registered under the provisions of the said act of the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, or under the 7 & 8 Vic. c. 90, the registrar of judgments shall, upon the lodgment with him of such certificate, cause a memorandum thereof to be annexed or subscribed to the entry of the registry of such decree, rule, or order, specifying therein the date of such certificate, and shall sign such memorandum, and shall, if required, cause a minute of the entry of such memorandum to be endorsed upon a duplicate of such certificate; and in every search made in said judgment office after the entry of such memorandum, whereon such decree, rule, or order shall appear, the entry of such memorandum of satisfaction shall also be stated.

12. That from and after the passing of this act no judgment, crown bond or recognizance, rule, decree, order, or lis pendens, shall be registered by the said registrar of judgments, pursuant to the 7 & 8 Vic. c. 90, unless and until there shall be subscribed to the memorandum or minute by said act required to be left with said registrar a certificate of the existence of the judgment, crown bond or recognizance, rule, decree, order, or lis pendens, described in said memorandum or minute, such certificate to be signed by the proper officer of the court in which such judgment, crown bond or recognizance, rule, decree, order, or lis pendens shall have been entered or obtained; and that the said registrar of judgments, upon the lodgment with him of any such memorandum or minute, shall, if required, endorse upon a duplicate thereof a certificate of the lodgment and entry thereof, for which certificate no fee shall be paid to him beyond the fee authorized by the said act for such entry.

13. ' And whereas by the 7 & 8 Vic. c. 90, no bonds or recognizances to the Crown to be thereafter entered into or passed shall affect lands, tenements, or hereditaments as to purchasers or mortgagees or creditors until duly registered according to the directions of the said act, but no similar provision is made with respect to obligations to the Crown previously existing: and whereas bonds and recognizances to the Crown passed or entered into at remote periods, and filed as of record in her Majesty's courts in Ireland, remain in full force, and operate as incumbrances on land, notwithstanding that the conditions upon which they were passed or entered into may have been long since satisfied and performed, and no claim may exist on foot thereof on the part of the Crown, and it is expedient to extend the principle of the aforesaid provision to such cases, and thereby further facilitate the transfer of landed property: be it enacted, that from and after the 1st of Jan. 1849, no bond or recognizance to the Crown so filed as of record in Ireland, which shall be more than twenty years old from the date thereof shall affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments as to purchasers or mortgagees or creditors, unless and until a memorandum or minute, duly authenticated, containing the name and usual or last known place of abode, and the title, trade, or profession of the person whose estate is intended to be affected, the sum for which such bonds or recognizance was passed or entered into, and the date of the same, shall be left with the registrar of judgments, who shall forthwith enter the same particulars in a book to be entitled "Re-docketed Crown Bonds and Recognizances," to be kept in alphabetical order by the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected by such bonds or recognizances; and for every such entry the said registrar shall be entitled to the same fee as is authorized by the said act for each entry in the book intitled "The Index of Debtors and Accountants to the Crown," and all persons shall be at liberty to search the said book, as well as the books directed by the said act to be kept by the said registrar, on payment of the fee by the said act authorized.

14. ' And whereas by the operation of this act the duties of certain offices may be diminished, and it will therefore be expedient, having regard to economy, to discontinue them as separate offices, and to provide for the discharge of such duties as may remain to be performed; be it enacted that in such cases the commissioners of her Majesty's treasury, or any three of them for the time being, shall have power, if they shall think fit, by their warrant, after the passing of this act, to order that a consolidation of any office so affected shall take place with some existing office of the court to which it belongs; and any order made as aforesaid for the regulation of the business of such office shall be of as much force as if it had been specifically enacted herein, and the officer to whom the duties as aforesaid shall be so transferred shall have as full power and jurisdiction for all official purposes as were enjoyed or belonged to the officer whose duties shall be so transferred.

DUBLIN, JUNE 30, 1849.

A BILL "to amend the law of judgments in Ireland," which will be found elsewhere in our present columns, has been brought into the House of Commons during the past week, the provisions of which, if enacted in their present shape, will rank among the most important statutes of the session, repealing the 9 Geo. 2, c. 5, and the 5 Geo. 2, c. 14—the acts giving power of assigning judgments, the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 55, s. 31, and 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 21, which gave creditors the power of appointing receivers by petition over the lands of their debtor—the statute of Westminster, 13 Ed. 2, c. 18, and 3 & 4 Vic. s. 19—so far as they relate to the time at which the sheriff is to find the seizure or possession of lands by the defendant, (which, after the 31st of December, 1849, is to be the period when the writ of Elegit is delivered to the sheriff for execution, instead of, as heretofore, the entry of the judgment,) and repealing the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 22, by which judgments were made a charge upon land.

Whether benefit will be derived from those portions of the contemplated Act which deprive a creditor of the power of assigning his judgment, and make it to be no longer a charge upon the lands of his debtor, we apprehend, will create much difference of opinion. The difficulties thrown in the way of the transfer of land, in consequence of the number of judgments affecting property in Ireland, operated most injuriously both upon debtor and creditor, the expense of clearing the title from these charges being great.

It had been also a matter of doubt, whether the release of a judgment over part of the lands of the debtor did not extinguish it as against the residue; but this has been set at rest by the 98th section of the 11 & 12 Vic. c. 48, (the Incumbered Estates Bill of last session;) and a judgment may now be released as to part, and be preserved as to the rest of the land which it bound.

Much of the evil connected with this species of security arose from the want of a single and proper registry; this has been removed by Sir Edward Sugden's last act, 7 & 8 Vic. c. 90, an act for the protection of purchasers, which, for the purpose of binding purchasers, rendered it necessary that every judgment should appear on the same registry; and no purchaser is affected, even though he have otherwise notice of the existence and validity of the judgment. Another evil arose from the universality of the judgment binding every existing interest in lands, and every future interest. And a still greater practical evil, was the facility of placing a debtor's lands under the controul of a Court of Equity for a trifling debt of £5 or £10; and this was much enhanced by the defective and ruinous system of managing estates by absentee receivers; and by a court which was powerless for improvement, and unfitted to assume the duties of a landlord over an impoverished or rack-rented tenantry.

These evils were curable by limiting the amount of debt for which a judgment creditor could obtain a receiver, and by improving the system of managing estates under the control of the Court. But despite even them, judgments were a favourite security in Ireland; they were the common assurance of the country; any change in the laws affecting them required caution, practical knowledge, great care, and deliberation.

That part of the bill which deprives the creditor of the power of appointing a receiver for judgments to be obtained after the 31st of December, 1849, appears, we think, very objectionable.

We believe, the policy of the legislature in proposing this measure was, to render the mode of proceeding upon judgments for the recovery of debts less facile, and the security less valuable, and thus drive capitalists to lend their money upon mortgage security. Even admitting the policy of the measure to be well founded, there appears to be considerable doubt as to its well-working. The remedy by elegit is still left open to the creditor. This is objectionable. That proceeding is more expensive to the debtor, and less satisfactory to the creditor. The sheriff having found by inquisition the metes and bounds, cannot deliver actual possession, but only such seizure as will enable the creditor to maintain his ejectment. The costs of these proceedings the debtor must bear, and perhaps those of litigated accounts, as to how much of the profits of the debtor's estate the creditor should or should not have received without default. He is at the uncontrolled mercy of his creditor. His estate lets for less than the value, as the creditor can give no certain tenure, and is precluded from abating rents, making allowances or improvements, as all would be charged against him in the account, as so much that might have been received by him towards the liquidation of his demand.

The policy of the measure being, as we have said, to prevent the borrowing of money upon judgment security, and supposing it fully effectuated by the proposed measure, there still must be a very large number of judgments in debt and damages, in actions in the superior courts; decrees, orders, and rules of the Courts of Equity, Law, and Bankruptcy, which have, and under this bill are proposed to be invested with, the effect of judgments entered after the 31st day of December, 1849—which cannot be said to come within the evils to be remedied, they not being strictly money advances. On all these, if execution against the body or goods be unavailing, the creditor must resort to his elegit. This could, we think, be better and less expensively done through the means of an improved system of receivers; for which purpose a committee of the House of Commons is, at this moment, collecting evidence as the foundation of a measure for the improvement of the receiver system. What we would propose is, that all persons obtaining a judgment in an action prosecuted in a superior court of law, and all persons having a money demand under such decrees, rules, or orders, as would have the force of judgments, and which judgment or demand, exclusive of the costs of obtaining such judgment or decree, &c., should not exceed £100, should still have the power of appointing a receiver; and it might be provided that all persons whose judgments, under a certain amount, should be founded on a warrant of attorney, should not have this power. This, with an improved system of receivership, and a reduction in the expenses of the petition, would work beneficially for creditor and country.

Whilst on the subject of receivers, though perhaps not within the scope of our present subject, we would suggest, that, whilst the amount of the judgment over which a receiver could be appointed should be limited in the one direction, to preserve the policy of the measure under consideration, and for the benefit of debtors a receiver should not be appointed, when the amount of the judgment obtained by confession was less than £100, or the income of his property available for the purpose of payment less than £50. In such cases a summary power of sale, on petition to the Master of the Rolls, or Lord Chancellor—who should be enabled to give a parliamentary title—would be most desirable. A measure of this nature, instead of interfering with, would work in the direction of the present bill, by facilitating the transfer of land.

If the intention of the legislature was to abolish the system of receivers in toto, we would not advocate their retention for this purpose alone; but independently of their existence in causes, receivers will be still appointed under the mortgage acts, and for at least twenty years under the 5 & 6 W. 4, and 3 & 4 Vic.

Independently of the policy of the bill before us, we have never seen one which, on a cursory glance, discloses a greater number of legal doubts. The first section repeals all those portions of the 5 & 6 W. 4, and the 3 & 4 Vic. 105, relating to receivers under the judgment acts, save so far as they relate to judgments or decrees, &c., entered into before the 31st of December, 1849. Suppose a judgment entered in March, 1849, revived within twenty years, could a receiver be appointed on the judgment of revivor? This, we apprehend, will raise a serious question, which, we believe, has not been satisfactorily settled, and will be found discussed in the cases of Farrell v. Gleason, (11 Cl. & Fin. 702); and Ottiswell v. Farran, (10 Cl. & Fin. 319.)

In the next place, under the provision in this bill there is no method whatever in proceeding upon a recognizance, except by bill. The 31 sec. of the 5 and 6 W. 4, c. 55, enacts that no grant in custodiam shall be made after the passing of that act, except in trust for the crown; a receiver cannot be appointed upon any recognizance entered after the 31st of December, 1849. So that there will be no summary mode of proceeding on a recognizance entered into after that date.

The 2nd section enacts that the sheriff shall deliver execution unto the party, in that behalf suing, of such lands, &c. as the debtor, at the time when such writ of elegit is delivered to the sheriff, had any disposing power. The 3 and 4 Vic. c. 105, extended the statute, West. 13, Ed. 1, c. 18, by conceding to the creditor the power of extending the whole of the debtor's lands, but did not repeal it, nor does this act. So that a question may arise whether the creditor may not still have his execution for the moiety, the enquiry being as to what lands the debtor was seized or possessed of, as to the moiety, at the time of the entry of the judgment instead of the delivery of the writ to the sheriff under this act.

The 3rd section leaves the equitable rights of judgment creditors as they existed before the passing of the 5 and 6 W. 4, c. 55.

The 4th section preserves the rights of judgment creditors after the 31st of December, 1849, with respect to the administration of assets, as they are at present.

The 5th section is a valuable enactment, giving judgments a preference to such conveyance, as under the statute of Frauds, 10 Car. 1 Stat. 2 c., 8 l., would be deemed void against purchasers for money, or other good consideration.

The 6th section gives decrees and orders of the Court of Chancery, and of the Equity Exchequer; and rules of the courts of common law; and all orders of the Lord Chancellor, or Master of the Rolls; or of the Court of Commissioners of Bankruptcy; or of the Lord Chancellor in matters of Lunacy, to be made after the 31st of December, 1849, the same efficacy as judgments entered after that date will have by virtue of this act.

The 7th section gives the same force to judgments of the inferior courts removed to the superior, as the last section gives decrees and orders, &c.

The 8th section gives the power of framing new writs.

Looking at the general frame and policy of this bill, with the exceptions stated, we think this is one of a class of measures which have been introduced without due consideration. That portion of it which takes away the power of appointing a receiver and re-introducing the exploded system of elegits, and the taking possession of the debtor's lands subject to an account in a court of law, we consider mischievous in the extreme. It is a recurrence to a bad system, fraught with the most extensive national evils. We hope the Irish Members will make a stand against the Bill. They will deserve the greatest censure, if it does not meet with a reasoning, well-considered, but most determined opposition.

The measure before us is sweeping, and will be received with great alarm by every professional man and every judgment creditor in Ireland.

The 21st general order of the Court of Chancery, 1843,* directs, "That when the plaintiff shall make a party to the suit, any person against whom no account, judgment, conveyance, or other direct relief is sought; or any person having a demand founded upon a recognizance or judgment, who shall not be in possession of the land or property, the subject of the suit, or some part thereof, and shall require such party to appear and answer the bill, the costs so incurred shall be paid by the plaintiff, &c."

If a suit be instituted in a court of Equity, and the land, the subject of the suit, be liable to more than one judgment debt, and the owner of one—prior to the filing of the bill—have appointed a receiver by petition under the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 55, and the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, over the whole or a portion of the land, and though the receiver be in the actual receipt of the rents and profits, and the subsequent creditors have extended that receiver to their own judgments, a question may arise as to whether the subsequent creditors, not having received any of the proceeds of the estate, in discharge of their demands, can be considered within the meaning of the rule in question, as "creditors by judgment or recognizance in possession of the land or property the subject of the suit."

In practice, we believe, it is usual to make such persons parties to the suit, and, perhaps, in the absence of judicial authority, it is the safer course—the inconvenience accruing from payment of their costs, if they should be held to be unnecessary parties, being less than that arising from their absence, if necessary. Following the analogy of the law and practice of Elegits, for which the receiver, under the statutes mentioned, is substituted, the better opinion would appear to be that until the creditor receives a payment on foot of his demand, he is not in possession within the meaning of the order, except he is either the creditor appointing the receiver and having a priority, who, in that case, must be taken to be in possession from the completion of the appointment of the receiver, or having originally extended the receiver, is the next in order to be paid, the demand of the prior creditor being satisfied, and the creditor accounted with by the receiver. In these cases the receiver being in perception of the rents for the benefit of the creditor it must be taken to be his possession though no money be actually paid him.

Before the passing of the 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 55, generally known as the Sheriff's act, if a judgment creditor issued an elegit, and went into possession, and another creditor of the same nature issued a second elegit, he could not get possession of the moiety already extended; if his judgment were of the same term as the first, the sheriff would give him the other moiety; if not, a moiety of that moiety (Cro. El. 481), that is, a fourth of the whole. And if the whole of the lands of the debtor, by two elegits of the same term, or by successive ones of different terms, were to come into the possession of creditors, no other creditor could go into possession, as the sheriff would return to any subsequent elegit, "no lands," (Imp. office of Sheriff, tit. Ex. Elegit.) And since the passing of the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, sec. 21, which enables the creditor to extend the entire of the debtor's bonds, no subsequent creditor could get possession till the first were paid off.

The 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 55, sec. 31, enacts, that any person entitled to sue out, or who has already sued out a writ of elegit, upon any judgment in any of the superior courts of law, &c., may apply by petition to the Court of Chancery, or to the Court of Equity Exchequer, for an order that a receiver may be appointed of the rents and profits of all lands, tenements, and hereditaments which he would be entitled to have extended or appraised under a writ of elegit. This enactment plainly substitutes the receiver for the elegit. The creditor must not only be in a position, with respect to his legal proceedings, to issue an elegit, but he can have his receiver over such property alone, as he could have extended under an elegit; and on examination of the multifarious cases on the appointment of receivers under this act, the courts will be found to have acted strictly in accordance with the decisions in elegit matters. The subsequent act, 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 19, extended the jurisdiction of the court enabling them to appoint receivers over property which, neither under the former act, nor by elegit could the creditor reach. With this exception neither the 5 & 6 W. 5, nor the 3 & 4 Vic. alter in any way the nature of the receiver's position as the mere representative of an elegit creditor in possession, and when extended by a second creditor, who could not get possession in consequence of the possession of a prior creditor, he was in the same position as if the second creditor, having kept his elegit alive by continued returns, until the first being paid off, the sheriff was enabled to give him possession. So, under the provisions of these acts, a continuing statutory right to go into possession by each creditor who might extend him to his demand according to his priority, is vested in the receiver; and the inclination of the authorities appears to be in this direction. In Morrough v. Hoare, (5 I. E. R. 195.)

it was decided that where there was a fusus in court or in the hands of a receiver appointed at the instance of a judgment creditor, it should be treated as if it had been realized by the judgment creditor himself when in possession under an elegit, and that it consequently should be paid to him, notwithstanding a claim by a prior specific incumbrancer. As in Hanley v. Langford, (5 L. Rec. 28. 204) the court—where it appeared on the face of the bill that the judgment creditor had proceeded by petitioning a receiver, but was disappointed in recovering his demand, in consequence of objections raised, held that the whole demand was still due—expressed an opinion that it need not be averred that he had issued an elegit; such proceeding being equivalent to the issuing execution at law—Mr. Baron Fry observing, that “the creditor was in the same situation as if he had issued execution, and there was a return of nulla bona. The court had, in fact, told him there were nulla bona.”

A BILL TO AMEND THE LAW CONCERNING JUDGMENTS IN IRELAND.*

Note.—The words printed in Italics are proposed to be inserted in the committee.

Whereas an act of the Parliament of Ireland was passed in the ninth year of King George the Second, intituled 'an act for the more effectual assigning of judgments, and for the more speedy recovery of rents by distress;' and an act of the Parliament of Ireland was passed in the twenty-fifth year of King George the Second, intituled 'an act to explain and amend an act passed in the ninth year of the reign of his present Majesty, intituled "an act for the more effectual assignment of judgments, and for the more speedy recovery of rents by distress," so far as the said act relates to the assignment of judgments and statutes, and to prevent great inconveniences that frequently happen to the suitors of the Court of Chancery by the death or removal of a six clerk or six clerks of the said court, and to enable grand juries to make presentments for the clerks of the crown and peace;' and whereas by an act passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled 'an act for facilitating the appointment of sheriffs in Ireland, and the more effectual audit and passing of their accounts; and for the more speedy return and recovery of fines, fees, forfeitures, recognizances, penalties, and deodands; to and abolish certain offices in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland; and to amend the laws relating to grants in custodiam and recovery of debts in Ireland; and to amend an act of the second and third years of His present Majesty, for transferring the powers and duties of the commissioners of public accounts in Ireland to the commissioners for auditing the public accounts of Great Britain,' it was enacted, that it should be lawful for any person entitled to sue out or who had already sued out a writ of elegit upon any judgment recovered in any of His Majesty's courts at Dublin, or to issue or who had issued execution in any suit or proceeding on any recognizance there, to apply by petition to the Court of Chancery, or to the Court of Exchequer at the Equity side thereof, for an order that a receiver might be appointed of the rents and profits of the entire, and not of a moiety only, of all lands, tenements, or hereditaments which he would be entitled to have extended or appraised under a writ of elegit, or extended, seized, or taken under a writ of levari facias, or other proceeding on such recognizance, or to have a receiver thereof appointed by that court extended to that matter, and it should be lawful for the court to appoint or extend a receiver accordingly over the whole thereof, or over so much thereof as should appear to it sufficient for the purposes of paying the sum due on such judgment or recognizance: and whereas by an act passed in the fourth year of Her Majesty's Reign, intituled "An act for abolishing arrest on mesne process in civil actions, except in certain cases, for extending the

"remedies of creditors against the property of debtors, and for the further amendment of the law, and the better advancement of justice in Ireland," it was enacted that it should be lawful for the sheriff or other officer to whom any writ of elegit, or any precept in pursuance thereof, should be directed at the suit of any person upon any judgment which, at the time appointed for the commencement of that act should have been recovered, or should be thereafter recovered in any action in any of Her Majesty's superior courts at Dublin, to make and deliver execution unto the party in that behalf suing of all such lands, tenements, rectories, tithes, rents, and hereditaments including lands and hereditaments, which might be of copyhold tenure, as the person against whom execution was so sued, or any person in trust for him should have been seized or possessed of at the time of entering up the said judgment, or at any time afterwards, or over which such person should, at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, have any disposing power which he might, without the assent of any other person, exercise for his own benefit, in like manner as the sheriff or other officer might then make and deliver execution of one moiety of the lands and tenements of any person against whom a writ of elegit was sued out, which lands, tenements, rectories, tithes, rents, and hereditaments by force and virtue of such execution should accordingly be held and enjoyed by the party to whom such execution should be so made and delivered, subject to such account in the court out of which such execution should have been sued out as a tenant by elegit was then subject to in a court of equity; and it was enacted, that it should be lawful for any person entitled to sue out or who had already sued out a writ of elegit upon any judgment recovered in any of Her Majesty's courts at Dublin, or to issue, or who had issued execution in any suit or proceeding on any recognizance there, to apply by petition to the Court of Chancery, or to the Court of Exchequer at the equity side thereof, for an order that a receiver might be appointed over any lands, tenements, rectories, tithes, annuities, rents, or hereditaments by that act made liable to be seized, extended, appraised, or taken in execution on any such judgment, or to order that any receiver appointed before the passing of that act over the property of any judgment debtor might be extended to the matter of such new petition, and that in proceeding under the said act of the sixth year of King William the Fourth and the act now in recital the said court of Chancery and court of Exchequer at the equity side thereof should have power to appoint or extend a receiver in a summary way, on a petition at the instance of such person, over any property of such judgment debtor which such creditor would or could make available for the payment of his judgment debt by filing (after a writ of execution had been issued and returned at law upon such judgment) a bill in a court of equity, or by any writ of execution at law, or (subject to the proviso therein-after contained) by petition under the provisions of the act now in recital, and it should be lawful for the said courts respectively to appoint or extend a receiver

accordingly over the whole thereof, or over so much thereof as should appear to be sufficient for the purposes of paying the sum due on such judgment or recognizance: and it was enacted, that a judgment already entered up, or to be thereafter entered up, against any person in any of her Majesty's superior courts at Dublin, should operate as a charge upon all lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents, and hereditaments, including lands and hereditaments of copyhold tenure, of or to which such person should at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, be seized possessed, or entitled for any estate or interest whatever at law or in equity, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or over which such person should at the time of entering up such judgment, or at any time afterwards, have any disposing power which he might without the assent of any other person exercise for his own benefit, and should be binding as against the person against whom judgment should be so entered up, and against all persons claiming under him after such judgment, and should also be binding as against the issue of his body, and all other persons whom he might, without the assent of any other person, cut off and debar from any remainder, reversion, or other interest in or out of any of the said lands, tenements, rectories, advowsons, tithes, rents, and hereditaments, and that every judgment creditor should have such and the same remedies in a court of equity against the hereditaments so charged by virtue of that act, or any part thereof, as he would be entitled to in case the person against whom such judgment should have been so entered up, had power to charge the same hereditaments and had, by writing under his hand, agreed to charge the same with the amount of such judgment debt and interest thereon, subject to the provisions in such act contained; and by the lastly-recited act the effect of judgments in the superior courts of common law was given to certain decrees, orders, and rules for payment of monies, costs, charges, and expenses: and whereas, it is expedient to amend the law concerning judgments in Ireland: be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after the 31st day of December, 1849, all the provisions of the said acts of the 9th and 25th years of King George the Second, relating to judgments, statutes staple, and statutes merchant, and the recited provisions of the said acts of the sixth year of King William the Fourth, and the 4th year of Her Majesty, shall be repealed, save so far as respects judgments entered up, recognizances entered into, and decrees, orders, and rules made on or before the said 31st day of December, 1849.

II. And be it enacted, that the sheriff or other officer to whom any writ of elegit, or any precept in pursuance thereof, is directed at the suit of any person upon any judgment entered up after the 31st day of December, 1849, in any action in any of Her Majesty's superior courts at Dublin, shall make and deliver execution unto the party in that behalf suing of all such lands, tenements, rectories, tithes, rents and hereditaments, only (including lands and hereditaments which may be of copyhold tenure) as the person against whom execution is so made, or any person in trust for him, is seized or possessed of, at the time when such writ of elegit is delivered to the sheriff or other officer to be executed, or over which the person against whom execution is so sued has, at the time when such writ of elegit is delivered as aforesaid, any disposing power which he might, without the assent of any other person, exercise for his own benefit, which lands, tenements, rectories, tithes, rents and hereditaments by force and virtue of such execution shall accordingly be held and enjoyed by the party to whom such execution shall be so made and delivered, subject to such account in the court out of which such execution shall have been sued out, as a party to whom execution is made and delivered under the provision hereby repealed of the said act of the fourth year of Her Majesty, is made subject to under such provision.

III. And be it enacted, that any creditor under a judgment entered up as aforesaid after the said 31st day of December, 1849, on which a writ of elegit has been sued out, shall have the same rights and remedies in equity, upon and in respect of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments as might under this act be delivered in execution under such elegit, as such creditor might have had in respect of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or moiety of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which might have been delivered in execution under a writ of elegit in case the provisions hereby repealed of the said acts of the sixth year of King William IV, and of the fourth year of her Majesty had not been enacted.

IV. And be it enacted, that in the administration in courts of Equity of the assets of any person against whom any judgment may be entered up as aforesaid, who shall die seized of or entitled to any estate or interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, the judgment creditor shall under such judgment have the same rights upon and in respect of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments as if this act had not been passed.

V. Provided always, and be it enacted, that every conveyance and other act whatsoever of and concerning lands, tenements, or hereditaments which under an act of the Parliament of Ireland passed in the tenth year of King Charles I, intituled "An act against covenantous and fraudulent conveyances," would be deemed void against purchasers for money or other good consideration, shall be void as against any judgment creditor whose judgment shall have been entered up before such conveyance or other act, and the like execution and other remedies may be had under such judgment in respect of such lands, tenements, and hereditaments as if such conveyance or other act had not been made or done: provided also, that nothing herein contained shall in anywise affect the provisions of the same act concerning conveyances and other acts had or made to the intent to delay, hinder, or defraud creditors.

VI. And be it enacted, that all decrees and orders of the Court of Chancery, and of the Court of Exchequer at the Equity side thereof, and all rules of any of the superior courts of Common Law, and all orders of the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls or of the Court of Commissioners of Bankruptcy, and all orders of the Lord Chancellor in matters of Lunacy, to which the effect of judgments in the superior courts of common law was given by the said act of the fourth year of her Majesty, shall, where such decrees, orders and rules respectively shall be made after the said 31st day of December, 1849, have the effect of judgments in the superior courts of common law entered up after the said 31st day of December, 1849, and the persons to whom any monies, costs, charges, and expenses are by such decrees, orders and rules respectively directed to be paid, shall have the remedies to which judgment creditors under judgments so entered up will have and be entitled to.

VII. And be it enacted, that any judgment, rule, or order of any inferior court of record, which, after the 31st day of December 1849, shall, under the provisions of the said act of the fourth year of Her Majesty, be removed into any of Her Majesty's superior courts of record at Dublin, shall have no further force or effect than a judgment recovered in or a rule or order made by, such superior court after the said 31st day of December, 1849; but, save as aforesaid, any judgment, rule, or order so removed shall be subject to the provisions of such last-mentioned act in relation to judgments, rules, or orders removed into any of such superior courts.

VIII. And be it enacted, that such new or altered writs shall be sued out of the courts of law and equity, and court of commissioners of bankrupt, as may by such courts respectively be deemed necessary or expedient for giving effect to the provisions herein-before contained, and in such forms as the judges of such courts respectively, shall, from time to time think fit to order, and the execution of such writs shall be enforced in such and the same manner as the execution of writs of execution is now enforced, or as near thereto as the circumstances of the case will admit, and that any existing writ, the form of which shall be in any manner altered in pursuance of this act shall, nevertheless, be of the same force and virtue as if no alteration had been made therein, except so far as the effect thereof may be varied by this act.

IX. And be it enacted, That this act may be amended or repealed in this present session of Parliament.

An act to amend the laws relating to Savings Banks in Ireland.

[5th September, 1848.]

Sec. 1. So much of 7 & 8 Vic. c. 83, as relates to limiting Responsibility of Trustees of Savings Banks in Ireland repealed.

2. Power to Trustees and Managers to limit their Responsibility.

3. Appointment of Auditors.

4. Depositor's Book to contain Copy of Rules. Duplicate Copy of certified Rules, &c., to be exhibited in Office.

5. Rules to provide for Production and Inspection of Books.

6. No Fee to Barrister in certain Cases.

7. Commissioners may close Account with Savings Banks in certain Cases, and re-open them if they think fit.

8. Term of Act.

9. Act may be amended, &c.

'Whereas it is expedient to amend the laws relating to savings banks in Ireland, and to make other and additional provisions respecting such savings banks: be it enacted, that so much of an act passed in the 7 & 8 Vic. c. 83, as relates to limiting the responsibility of trustees and managers of savings banks in Ireland, except as to any liability incurred or to be incurred before the 20th of November, 1849.

2. That from and after the 20th of November, 1848, any trustee or manager of a savings bank in Ireland who has declared or shall declare, in writing under his hand deposited with the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, that he is willing to be answerable for a specific amount only, such amount being in no case less than one hundred pounds, shall not be liable to make good any deficiency which may thereafter arise in the funds of such savings bank beyond the amount specified in such writing: provided that the trustee and manager of every savings bank in Ireland shall be personally liable for all monies actually received by him on account of or to and for the use of such institution, and not paid over and disposed of in the manner directed by the rules of the institution; and an extract of this provision shall be enrolled as one of the rules of every such savings bank, and printed and affixed in every office or place where deposits are received, with the names and places of residence of the trustees and managers for the time being, and the amount, if any, to which they have collectively or individually limited their responsibility.

3. That the trustees of each savings bank in Ireland shall, as soon as conveniently may be after the passing of this act, and from time to time in case of a vacancy, appoint an auditor or auditors to audit the accounts of the said institution, as well as to examine and inspect the books of the several depositors; and the said trustees shall, immediately after such appointment, transmit the signature, name, and address of the said auditor or auditors to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt; and the trustees of every savings bank shall cause the annual and other statements required to be transmitted under the acts relating to savings banks to be certified and verified by the auditor or auditors appointed by the said trustees, in addition to the attestation by trustees and managers now required by the said acts; and shall also cause a certificate from the said auditor or auditors as to the result of his or their examination of such of the depositor's books as may have been produced to him or them for examination to be transmitted with the said annual statement to the said commissioners: provided that the trustees of any such savings bank may agree with the trustees of any other savings bank or banks as to the appointment of a common auditor or auditors; and the auditor or auditors so appointed for all the said banks shall be deemed and taken, as soon as the signature, name, and address shall have been transmitted by each such bank to the said commissioners, to be the auditor or auditors of each such bank.

4. That every depositor in every savings bank in Ireland on his first deposit shall be furnished with a deposit book, in which shall be printed at length a copy of the certified rules of the savings bank in which he shall make such deposit, and that a duplicate copy of the certified rules, and of every alteration and amendment thereof, and a duplicate copy of every annual statement or account required by and furnished to the said commissioners, signed by two trustees or managers of any such savings bank, shall be from time to time exhibited in the office of such savings bank, and shall be open to the inspection of every depositor or person intending to be such.

5. That the rules of every savings bank in Ireland shall specify a number of days, not less than two in every year ending on the 20th of November, on which the book of each depositor shall be produced at the office of the said savings bank for the purpose of being inspected, examined, and verified with the books of the institution by the auditor or auditors; and in case the said book shall not be produced on or before the last of the days mentioned in any one year ending as aforesaid, the said account shall be closed, and all interest shall cease to accrue on the sums deposited from the last day of the year in which the said book should have been so produced, in the case of every depositor who shall have received notice to produce his said book, and of every depositor in a savings bank the rules of which provide for the production of deposit book once in each year: provided nevertheless, that the trustees or managers shall have the power to re-open the said account, but only to allow interest thereon from the time when the same shall have been re-opened, unless the trustees shall be satisfied that such depositor has been prevented by some sufficient cause from producing the deposit book at the time so specified; and an extract of this provision shall be enrolled as one of the rules of every savings bank.

6. That no fee shall be payable to the barrister for certifying the rules of savings banks in any case where his certificate is required only in consequence of the insertion of this provision in the rules of any savings bank.

7. That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said commissioners that the clauses of the said recited act and this act, or the orders, directions, and regulations of the said commissioners, signified by the comptroller general to the trustees of any savings bank in Ireland, have not been complied with by the trustees or managers of any savings bank in Ireland, the said commissioners, may close the account of the said savings bank, and discontinue the keeping any further account with the trustees thereof, and to direct that no further sum shall be received at the bank of Ireland from the trustees of such savings bank to the account of the commissioners until such time as such commissioners shall think proper: provided that the said commissioners may re-open and allow the growing interest of such accounts during the time of such discontinuance, and authorize the receipt of money at the bank of Ireland, whenever the said commissioners shall think fit, upon such trustees complying with the directions of such commissioners; and the said commissioners shall forthwith publish a notification of such account being closed, or of the same being re-opened, in the Dublin Gazette, and also in some newspaper published in the county in which the said savings bank shall be established.

8. That this act shall continue and be in force until the 1st of January, 1850, and until the end of the then next session of parliament.

9. That this act may be amended or repealed by any act to be passed in this session of Parliament.

DUBLIN, JULY 7, 1849.

THE very extensive alteration proposed in the law with regard to judgments, and the importance of the subject, induce us again to recur to it.

The opinions of some of the ablest members of the profession and of the judicial bench, are divided on the question of the Judgment Acts. On the one hand, it is contended, that the assurance by judgment has been found so mischievous where the entry of the judgment operates as a charge upon land, that the entire repeal of the statutes which make it such a charge, and which confer upon the creditor the power of appointing a receiver, would be most desirable.

The arguments on this side of the question are based on the mischiefs which have flowed, from the facilities given to incumber, from the universality of the effect of judgments—attaching not only on the debtor's then existing, but on all his after acquired property—from the impediments thrown in the way of the transfer of land, and from the fearfully accumulating mass of property placed under the control of Courts of Equity, whereby the relation of landlord and tenant is at once severed, and properties and people alike wasted and ruined.

Actuated by this reasoning, the Government have introduced a measure prospectively doing away with the power of assigning judgments, making them no longer a charge upon lands until execution has been sued out, and then only a charge upon that property of the debtor which at the time of the delivery of the writ to the sheriff, the debtor was seized of, or had a disposing power over; and taking away altogether the jurisdiction of Courts of Equity to appoint receivers. The statute of Westminster is so far altered, that the entirety and not a moiety of the debtor's lands is to be delivered by the sheriff; but, with this exception, the law of elegit is proposed to be restored to the same position as before the passing of Sir Michael O'Loughlin's Act. The opponents of the proposed measure rest their opposition to it on various grounds; amongst others, that after great deliberation the law was advisedly changed in 1840, by making judgments a charge upon lands; that frequent mutation in legislation, more especially when the movement is a retrograde one, is unwise, its effect being to create a disturbance in the law and a shock to public credit, and to establish a different code for the same mode of assurance, the security being different as respects judgments prior to 1850, and those subsequent to that date; that the security by judgment has for more than a century been a favourite one in this country, and, under certain restrictions, a very convenient one; that judgments need not necessarily prove an impediment to the transfer of land; and that, conceding to the fullest extent the mischiefs created by the "fatal facility" in appointing receivers, it would be much better to improve the system of managing estates under our Courts of Equity, than, by taking away the jurisdiction alluded to, to allow a recurrence to an incomparably worse mode of management, by which the creditor takes possession of the estate, subject to an account in a Court of Law!

It was in fact the evils of elegits and custodiams, the inapplicability of Courts of law, from their constitution and want of machinery, to take accounts, protect the unfortunate tenant, and prevent the collusion of the inheritor, that induced the Legislature to pass the Sheriff's Act. It requires a strong argument to shew why the steps of the Legislature should be retraced, and none whatever has been shewn, the Solicitor-General having stated no reasons for the change, when he introduced the bill.

For our own part, we subscribe to the reasons of the opposition; the evils incident to the security by judgment can be very well combatted in detail; at least, the public mind is not prepared for so great a change as that contemplated. It is too late to recede from the principle of the 3rd & 4th Vic; of this opinion, at least, is Sir Edward Sugden, who proposes a modification and not a repeal.

He would have no receiver appointed for a debt under a certain limit—say, £100, nor until the judgment was a year old. That portion of the statute which gives the judgment creditor who appoints the receiver priority for his costs, should be repealed, and the costs should follow, as in causes, the priority of the demand, and the amount realized should be distributed likewise according to priority. These changes, apparently unimportant, would have a most beneficial effect in limiting the number of applications for receivers with which our Courts now swarm. We look for the mitigation, if not the removal, of the national evil inflicted by such appointments, to an improved administration of property by our Courts of Equity.

There is a vast amount now under its control; there always will be a certain number of cases in which a sale would not be desirable.

By vesting in a concentrated body power to manage, to improve, the debtor's estate, the benefit, so far as public good is concerned, is incalculably greater than that to be derived from doing away with the office of receiver, and permitting the creditor to take possession, without any other object than that of wresting his money from the lands.

Look to the abuses of the old system,—its expense—its tendency to produce litigation—to foster fraud—and its various imperfections, and no man practically acquainted with them but will deplore its revival.

Can it be intended that the creditor must issue his writ of elegit—that the sheriff is to impanel no jury, though supposed to hold an inquisition as to the value of the lands—that a fictitious finding of is to be binding as to that value—that after that expense and circuity are performed, there remains behind an action of ejectment, its delays, its expense—and that all this antiquated, obsolete process is to be adopted for the recovery of a debt of record? Can it be intended to open a fresh door to fraud, in accounting before a tribunal unfit to take the account?

Whether we contemplate the general scope of the proposed measure or its particular provisions, we view it as fraught with danger, and we sincerely trust that it will not be pressed forward or made the law of the land.

That portion of the statute which repeals the 9 Geo. 2, c. 5, and the 25 Geo. 2, c. 14, and makes judgments no longer assignable at law, we think objectionable.

In England, judgments are assignable only in Equity, the assignment being effected indirectly and expensively which here is made directly and comparatively inexpensively. If the power of assignment be permissible in any form, we hold that to be the best which gives the assignee all the powers of the assignor. How does it affect the estate or the debtor more injuriously, that proceedings are taken in the name of A. B., the assignee, rather than that of C. D., the assignor? If the assignment be recognized at Law, the ~~former~~ will be the case; if only in Equity, the latter; but the proceedings are taken no less, we admit, with greater embarrassment to the creditor—an object not desirable.

The grounds of opposition to the security by judgment are, however, more tenable, when it is compared with the security by mortgage—the great defect of the former being its want of specification; it is a sort of voracious monster, that seizes on every present and future interest.

We should be rejoiced to have the charging effect of a judgment assimilated to that of a mortgage—the lands that are intended to be bound being specified in the judgment; in fine, to have a sort of statutable mortgage. If this object were attainable—the management of property under our courts of Equity improved—a limit placed as to the amount for which a judgment by confession could be obtained—and a time fixed after its entry, prior to which a receiver could not be procured—the costs of that receiver's appointment made to rank with the demand, and be entitled to no priority—we believe such a change in the law would be acceptable to the great body of the profession and to the country generally. It would at least be a more easy preparation for a change than the present violent and sudden measure.

It would not be discordant with the present law, and it certainly is advantageous, to preserve uniformity of principle and practice, with reference to the same security.

By the 2nd section of the new bill, the judgment will not operate against lands, until the writ be delivered to the sheriff, so that all conveyances and mortgages for good consideration made immediately between even the execution and the delivery of the writ will defeat and delay the judgment creditor.

Will this provision, or will it not, open a door to fraud? Will the action of ejectment, founded on the sheriff's return, be a mere form, or very often a seriously contested one? Will litigation be thereby checked or promoted?

Is the English Solicitor-General, to whom all legislative activity for this country is confided, aware of what the old practice was, with reference to the inquisition by the sheriff, and the supposed jury—that it was all a fiction—that the sheriff for his fee gave what appraised value, and what return the creditor pleased?

Has he ever been informed of the difficulties of procuring a proper account in a court of law? of the bills to account that have sprung from that difficulty?

Has he taken into consideration, with regard to purchasers, the inexpediency of having the sheriff's court the court of record for judgments which bind land, when elegit after elegit will be poured in, and no power to put the creditor in privy with the fund?

It would be well that at least some few of the salient defects of the system should be pointed out before he involves the country in mischiefs which it will not be very easy to remove.

THE tenure of lands under leases for lives containing covenants for perpetual renewal has been a source of much litigation and great practical inconvenience. For the second time an act of Parliament has been introduced abolishing prospectively estates of this character, and providing for the conversion of those at present existing into estates of inheritance in fee simple, subject to perpetual yearly fee-farm rents.

This conversion is intended to be carried out by petition to the Court of Chancery or Equity Exchequer by the owner of any lease or underlease, that grants may be made to and accepted by all lessees in perpetuity at the same time that he applies to have his own leasehold interest converted into a tenure in fee, and thus, no matter how many derivative interests in perpetuity may exist between the owner in fee and the last lessee in perpetuity, this lessee may have at once all the superior interests converted into estates of inheritance in fee simple, subject to a fee-farm rent.

The amount of these fee-farm rents is the subject of a simple calculation: in cases where the fines payable on the fall of a life are only nominal, the fee-farm rent is to remain the same as the rent reserved in the lease about to be converted. In cases where the fines are not nominal the fee-farm rent is to be the aggregate amount of the reserved rent and the value of the renewal fine and fees (if any), such value to be estimated with regard to the probable duration of the subsisting term, the average duration of life, and the respective periods of renewal, but without regard to, and exclusively of any penal rent or sums made payable on neglect, delay or refusal to apply or take renewal, and in the event of the parties differing as to the value of the annual value of the renewal fines and fees, a power is given to apply to the Court of Chancery or the Court of Exchequer in a summary way by petition to have the amount determined.

In addition to the fee-farm rent the party whom this act requires to make the grant in fee simple is entitled to the benefit of all covenants and conditions for payment of rent and otherwise, and all reservations contained in the lease about to be converted, (except the covenant to grant, or to accept, or to take a renewal,) as well as all covenants that by law run with the land; and power is given, on the agreement of the parties, to commute any of these covenants, conditions or reservations for an increase in the fee-farm rent, excepting covenants, which interfere with the proper cultivation of the soil, which covenants the lessees are empowered to require should be done away with, the fee-farm rent to be increased so as to compensate for the value of such covenants, such value (in case of difference between the parties) to be determined by the Court of Chancery or Equity Exchequer on application made for that purpose; and a further power is given, on consent of both parties, by which the lessee may allocate a portion of the land comprised in his lease, in fee simple in lieu of the fee-farm rent which would be otherwise payable under the grant, or such fee-farm rent or any part thereof may be made payable out of any sufficient part of the lands—the residue of the lands being discharged therefrom.

Here we have a machinery by which all the lands held under leases of lives with a covenant of perpetual renewal may, at the option of the lessees, be converted into estates of inheritance in fee simple, subject to a fee-farm rent and certain conditions and reservations contained in the leases—these conditions and reservations may, by the agreement of the parties, be commuted into an increase of rent, and the rent itself may also, by the arrangement of the parties, be exchanged for a portion of the very land thus leased in perpetuity; so that it is possible for the lessee to get rid both of the conditions, reservations, and rent itself, by the allocation of a part of his land, and hold the remainder in fee simple discharged from any duty whatsoever.

But while power is thus given to be discharged, of the rent, by agreement between the parties, great facilities are conferred for its recovery; in case it be made payable in the grant, it is made recoverable by distress, ejectment for non-payment of rent, action of debt, covenant, and all other ways, means, remedies, actions, suits, or otherwise, by which rent service reserved on any common lease or demise, for a life or lives, is, or may be, by law recoverable. In actions of replevin, debt, or covenant, or other proceeding founded on the grant, proof that the plaintiff or other person, or any person or persons through whom he claims, has or have been in the possession or receipt of such fee-farm rent for three years, shall be sufficient evidence of the title of the plaintiff or other person thereto. However, to counterbalance these powers, the time for redemption in case of ejectment for non-payment of rent, is much extended. Any person having an interest in the lands out of which such fee-farm rent is payable, having it in his power, on the person who has made default in the payment, failing to redeem within six months after execution executed, to do such acts, and take such proceedings for the redemption of the lands from the said judgment and execution, within nine months after execution executed, as mortgagees of a lease might do or take, for the redemption of the lease, and making any money advanced for such redemption a lien and charge, not only upon the estate and interests of the person who has made default in payment of the rent, but upon all the inheritance upon which such estate or interest is subsisting, in priority to all other interests and charges whatsoever upon such inheritance, save charges created under the acts relating to the drainage of lands, and improvement of lands in Ireland.

There is nothing to regret in the abolition of a species of tenure, under which great parts of the land in this kingdom were held. By the proposed enactment, the rights of all parties concerned are protected; the lessors are secured in the payment of their reserved rents, the value of their renewal fines, their covenants, reservations, and conditions, or the value of them, if they agree to commute them for an increase of rent; the lessees are protected from litigation, are given a secure and quiet tenure, as long as they continue to perform the stipulated services, and the possibility of freeing themselves, in favourable circumstances, from all conditions, covenants, reservations, or rent. If security of tenure will have any influence in raising the condition, and increasing the industry and wealth of the occupier of land in this country, this act will be found of great public utility.

By it, likewise, a distinct species of property, hitherto exempt, will be rendered liable to taxation for the support of the poor, as it is expressly enacted, that where any fee-farm rent made payable by any grant under this act is greater in amount than the rent reserved in the lease or under-lease in perpetuity to the owner of which such grant is made, the party paying such rent shall be entitled to deduct from the party receiving the same, the proper poundage in respect of the poor's rate, from the portion of such rent which by virtue of this act is added to the amount of rent previously payable. Now, the addition to be made to the amount of rent previously payable will be the value of the renewal fines, fees, and commuted conditions, covenants, and reservations: so that thus renewal fines, fees, and the value of conditions, covenants, &c., will be thus rendered liable to poor rate. Holding, as we do, that no individual should be permitted to plead exemption from contributing to the support of the poor, by reason of his enjoying some peculiar species of property, we are glad to see the Legislature thus seizing on opportunities, as they offer, for extending the area over which this tax shall be spread.

The rapidity with which this enactment will succeed in converting leases with covenants for perpetual renewal into estates of inheritance in fee simple, subject to fee-farm rents, will depend entirely on the estimate which the owners of such leases will form of the advantages to be derived from these conversions; but however rapid or tardy this conversion may be, the Legislature have provided that no leases with covenants for perpetual renewal shall henceforward be created; "every lease with a covenant for perpetual renewal made after the passing of this act, shall, notwithstanding anything herein contained to the contrary, operate as a conveyance of the lands specified therein to the intended lessee, his heirs and assigns, for ever, at a fee-farm rent equal to the rent expressed to be reserved in such lease; and all reservations of fines or fees, and covenants for their payment, shall be altogether void."

The power of ejectment where there is no reversion, is wisely bestowed; we anticipate its extension to all cases of rents reserved by leases, irrespective of the consideration, whether the term be co-extensive with that of the lessor or not. It is a mistake to suppose that the laws regulating the relation of landlord and tenant form a landlord code, the fact being, that in many instances the rights of the landlord are utterly disregarded. Among the most mischievous of recent measures was that which took away the right of distress upon growing crops.

As there is little doubt that the Act for the Sale of Incumbered Estates will be made law this session, and as extensive alterations have been made in the bill by the Select Committee of the House of Lords, we purpose to abstract the new clauses, and point out the alterations made since the bill was first introduced and given in our pages, ante 227.

With the exception that the blank for the salaries of the Commissioners has been filled up—the first Commissioner to have £3000 per annum, and the other two £2000 a-year each—the first fifteen sections have undergone no material alteration.

The 16th, 17th, and 18th sections of the amended bill are as follows:—

16. And be it enacted, that where land in Ireland, or a lease in perpetuity, or any lease for a term whereof not less than sixty years shall be unexpired at the time of such application as hereinafter mentioned, or any church or college lease, of land in Ireland, shall be subject to any incumbrance, it shall be lawful for the owner of such land or lease, within three years from the passing of this act, to apply to the commissioners for a sale of such land or lease under the provisions of this act.

17. And be it enacted, that where any land in Ireland, or any such lease as aforesaid of land in Ireland, shall be subject to any incumbrance, it shall be lawful for any incumbrancer on such land or lease, within three years from the passing of this act, to apply to the Commissioners for a sale under the provisions of this act of the whole or part (as in the judgment of the Commissioners may appear necessary) of such land or lease, for the purpose of discharging the incumbrances thereon.

18. And be it enacted, that where an application for a sale of any land or lease had been dismissed with costs by a competent tribunal, no application by the same party for a sale of such land or lease, or any part thereof, shall be entertained by the Commissioners, unless it is shown that such costs have been paid.

The 19th, 20th, and 21st sections correspond with the 17th, 18th, and 19th of the old bill.

The 22nd is new—

22. Provided always, and be it enacted, that the Commissioners shall not make an order for sale of any land or lease, or any part thereof, upon application by an incumbrancer on such land or lease, in case it be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, by the owner of such land or lease, that the amount of the yearly interest on the incumbrances and other yearly payments (if any) in respect of charges payable out of the income of such land or lease, and the other lands or leases (if any) subject to the incumbrance of such incumbrance, do not exceed one half of the gross yearly income of such land or lease, or of all the lands or leases so subject.

The 23rd corresponds in number with the 20th, but is more full.

23. And be it enacted, that where a sale shall be made under this act the Commissioners shall, where and so far as they may deem necessary for the purposes of such sale, ascertain the tenancies of the occupying tenants, and of any lessees or under-lessees whose tenancies, leases or under-leases affect the land or lease, or part thereof, to be sold, and may give such notices and make or cause to be made such inquiries as they shall think necessary for ascertaining and securing the rights of such tenants, lessees, or under-lessees as aforesaid; and all occupying tenants, and all persons being or claiming to be lessees or under-lessees as aforesaid, shall, at such times and places as the commissioners may by all notices require, produce all leases, under-leases, and agreements in writing under which such tenants or persons occupy or claim to hold, if such leases, under-leases, or agreements, or counterparts thereof are in their possession or power, and where they occupy or claim to hold under leases, under-leases, or agreements in writing not in their possession or power, or under parol agreements or lettings, they shall deliver, at such times and places as aforesaid, particulars of the terms and conditions upon and subject to which they occupy or claim to hold; and every sale shall be made subject to the tenancies, leases, or under-leases ascertained as aforesaid, and subject to which the owner or incumbrancer applies; for a sale under this act shall be owner or incumbrancer, and such other of the tenancies, leases, and under-leases, ascertained as aforesaid, as shall appear to the Commissioners to have been granted in fee by the owner or person in possession or receipt of the rents and profits, and subject to which it shall appear to the Commissioners the sale shall be made, save such (if any) of such respective tenancies, leases, and under-leases as with consent as hereinafter mentioned, shall be included in the sale; or the sale may, where the Commissioners think fit, be made subject to any leases, under-leases, or tenancies, according to any general description or subject to any condition concerning leases, under-leases, or tenancies the nature of which shall not have been ascertained or shall be disputed; and, when the Commissioners shall think fit, such sale may be made subject to any annual charge affecting the land or lease, or part thereof, sold, or to any such apportioned part of the annual charge as the Commissioners may think fit should remain charged thereon; and where such land or lease, or part thereof, is subject to any incumbrance under the terms of which the incumbrancer cannot be required to make payment of the principal money before the expiration of a term of years unexpired, such sale, if the Commissioners think fit, be made subject to such incumbrance.

The 24th and 25th correspond with the 21st and 22nd. They relate to the sale under the direction of the Commissioners, and the payment of the purchase money.

The 26th is new:—

26. Provided always, and be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for any incumbrancer on or person otherwise interested in any land or lease, or part thereof, (other than the incumbrancer or owner on whose application the sale has been ordered,) to bid at any public sale, and to become the purchaser at any public sale or by private contract, in the same manner as any person not interested therein might bid and become the purchaser; and, by leave of the commissioners, it shall be lawful for the incumbrancer or owner on whose application the sale has been ordered to bid and become the purchaser; and where an incumbrancer on any land or lease, or part thereof, shall be the purchaser of such land or lease, or part thereof, the commissioners may, where they think fit, authorise such purchaser to retain out of the purchase money the amount which might have been ordered to be paid thereout in respect of such incumbrance in case the whole purchase money had been paid into the bank of Ireland under this Act, or such sum on account of such amount as the Commissioners may think fit, and to pay the residue only of the purchase money into the said bank; and where at the time of authorizing such retainer as aforesaid the Commissioners shall not finally have ascertained and determined the priority and rights of such purchaser in respect of his incumbrance, and the amount which he would be entitled to be paid in respect thereof out of the purchase money, such retainer shall be without prejudice to the power of the Commissioners to require such purchaser to pay into the said bank the whole or any part of the amount so retained, which ought to be so paid by him; and the Commissioners shall withhold their certificate of payment herein-before mentioned until they shall be satisfied that the full purchase money, less the amount which such purchaser would be entitled to be paid in respect of his incumbrance has been paid into the said bank.

The 27th corresponds with the 23rd, and relates to the effect of the assurance.

The 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 32nd, and 33rd nearly coincide with the 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th.

The 34th is more extensive than the 30th.

34. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners to sell any land or lease, or part thereof, discharged from any crown rent or quit rent which they may be enabled and may, with the consent of the owner think fit to purchase, or from any charge made by virtue of the said acts of the sixth year and 10th year of her Majesty, or either of them, which they may, with such consent, think fit to pay off or redeem; and in any such case the Commissioners shall, out of the money arising from the sale, and in preference to all other payments thereout, pay the consideration for the purchase of such crown rent or quit rent, or such sum as may be necessary for paying off or redeeming such charge; and it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, where they think fit, to pay to any person entitled to any annual or other charge, not being an incumbrance according to the definition of this act, who may consent to accept the same, a gross sum in discharge, or by way of redemption thereof, or a part thereof; and where a part only of any land or lease, subject to any incumbrance or charge, is sold, to charge the part not sold with such incumbrance or charge, or an apportioned part thereof, in exoneration of the money arising from the sale, and to enable or authorise persons to release the money arising from the part so sold from any incumbrance or charge, or to relinquish their claim on such money in respect thereof, without impairing or affecting such incumbrance or charge as to the remaining part of the land or lease originally charged; and the Commissioners, where they think fit, may invest or provide for the investment of money, to meet any annual or periodical charge, or any other charge, incumbrance, or interest, where, by reason of such charge, incumbrance, or interest being contingent or otherwise, it shall appear to the Commissioners proper or expedient so to do, and otherwise may make such orders and directions for applying the money arising from any sale in such manner as will secure the convenient application thereof for the benefit and according to the rights of the parties interested in the land or lease, or part thereof, from the sale of which the same shall have arisen.

The 35th corresponds with the 31st. The 36th is new.

36. And be it enacted, that where there shall be separate applications to the Commissioners for sales under this act, of any land, and of any lease in the same land, or of two or more leases in the same land, or there shall be such applications for sales of different undivided shares of any land or lease, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, where they shall see fit so to do, to include, with the consent of the persons by whom such respective applications may be made or prosecuted, and of any other persons whose consent the Commissioners may, under the circumstances, think fit to require, in the same sale, upon such terms as they think fit, such land and lease, or such leases, or such several undivided shares as aforesaid; and where there shall be separate applications for sales under this act, of any land, and of any lease in other land, or of different lands or leases in different lands, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, where, from the lands being intermixed, or from other circumstances, it shall appear to them convenient so to do, to include, with such consent as aforesaid, such land and lease, or lands or leases, in the same sale, upon such terms as they may think fit; and where any land or lease, or part thereof, subject to any incumbrance is proposed or ordered to be sold under this act, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, upon the application of the owner of any lease or under-lease, or estate in reversion, or other estate or interest whatsoever in the same land, (and although such lease, under-lease, estate in reversion, or other estate or interest be not subject to any incumbrance, or would not, if subject to any incumbrance, be subject to be sold under an order of the Commissioners under the provisions herein-before contained,) or upon the application of any incumbrancer on any such lease, under-lease, estate, or interest, to include the same, upon such terms as they may see fit, in the sale of the land or lease, or part thereof, so proposed or ordered to be sold as aforesaid; and all the provisions of this act applicable to any land or lease subject to any incumbrance, and ordered to be sold under this act, and to any incumbrance or charge upon such land or lease, and to the purchase money arising from the sale thereof, and to the conveyance or assignment thereof shall, so far as circumstances admit, extend and be applicable to every such lease, under-lease, estate in reversion, or other estate or interest to be so included in the sale; and in every such case as aforesaid, the Commissioners shall apportion the purchase money and expenses as they see fit.

The 37th, 38th, 39th, 40th, 41st, and 42nd sections correspond with the 33rd, 34th, 35th, 36th, 37th, and 38th.

The 43rd, 44th, 45th, 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th are new.

43. And be it enacted, that where an application shall be made for a sale under this act of an undivided share of any land or lease, or where any such undivided share shall have been sold under this act, and either before or after the conveyance or assignment thereof under this act, the Commissioners, on the application of any party interested in such undivided share, or of the purchaser (as the case may be), and after causing to be given such notices to the owner or owners of the other undivided share or shares of the same land or lease as they may think fit, and hearing such parties interested in the respective shares as may apply to them and making or causing to be made such inquiries as may enable them to make a just partition, and if they think fit, make an order under their seal for the partition of such land or lease; and in such order, or in a map or plan annexed thereto, shall be shown the part allotted in severalty in respect of each of the undivided shares in such land or lease; and the commissioners shall have the like authorities, jurisdiction, and powers in relation to such partition as a court of equity would have in the case of a partition under the direction of such court; and the part so allotted in severalty in respect of each such undivided share by such order of partition as aforesaid shall, without any conveyance or other assurance in relation thereto, go and come to and upon the same uses and trusts, and be subject to the same conditions, charges, and incumbrances, as the undivided share in respect of which the same is so allotted would have stood limited been subject to in case such order had not been made; and the like order for a sale of the part allotted in respect of the undivided share to which the application for the sale shall relate may be made (where the order for partition is made before sale) and the like proceedings had in relation to such sale, and the like conveyance or assignment may be made of the part allotted in respect of the share sold (where the order for partition is made after sale, and before conveyance or assignment,) and with the like consequences in the several cases aforesaid, as if the application for a sale, or the sale, (as the case may be), had been in respect of the part so allotted as aforesaid; and where any land or lease, or part thereof, to be sold under this act, is subject to any lease, under-lease, or tenancy under which the lessees, under-lessees, or tenants hold jointly or as tenants in common, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, on the application of any such lease, under-lessee, or tenant, and after causing to be given such notices as they may think fit, and hearing such parties as may apply to them, and making such inquiries as they may think necessary, to make an order under their seal for the partition, as between such lessees, under-lessees, or tenants, of the land included in their lease, under-lease, or tenancy, and for the apportionment of the rent reserved or payable under such lease, under-lease, or tenancy; and after such order of partition the owner of the reversion in the respective parts of the land shall have the like remedies for the apportioned rents against the respective parts out of which the same shall be payable, and the lessees, under-lessees, or tenants holding such respective parts under such lease, under-lease, or tenancy, and such order of partition, as were subsisting for the entire rent before such partition and apportionment; and all the covenants, conditions, and agreements of every such lease, under-lease, or tenancy, except as to the amount of rent to be paid, shall, as regards the respective parts allotted on such partition, and the apportioned parts of the rent, remain in force as against the respective lessees, under-lessees, or tenants to whom under such partition such respective parts shall be allotted.

44. And be it enacted, that where an application shall be made for a sale under this act of any land or lease, or part thereof, or where the same shall have been sold under this act, and either before or after the conveyance or assignment thereof under this act, if application be made to the commissioners by any party interested in such land or lease, or by the purchaser, (as the case may be,) for the exchange of all or any part of such land, or of all or any part of the land comprised in such lease, for other land which the owner thereof may be willing to give in exchange, the commissioners may make or cause to be made such inquiries as they may think fit for ascertaining whether such exchange would be beneficial to the persons interested in the respective lands, and cause such notices to be given to parties interested in the respective lands as they may think fit; and if, after making such inquiries, and hearing such parties interested in the respective lands as may apply to them, the commissioners shall be of opinion that such exchange would be beneficial, and that the terms thereof as proposed, or as modified by them, with the consent of such owner as aforesaid, are just and reasonable, they may make an order under their seal for such exchange accordingly, and in such order for exchange, or in a map or plan annexed thereto, shall be shown the lands given and taken in exchange respectively under such order; and the land taken upon such exchange under such order shall, without any conveyance or other assurance in relation thereto, go and enure to and upon the same uses and trusts, and be subject to the same conditions, charges, and incumbrances, as the land given on such exchange would have stood limited or been subject to in case such order had not been made; and the like order for a sale may be made in respect of the land taken in exchange for any land, or any land comprised in any lease to which the application for a sale shall relate, (where the order for exchange is made before sale,) and the like proceedings had in relation to such sale, and the like conveyance or assignment may be made in respect of the land taken in exchange for the land or lease, or part thereof sold, (where the order for exchange is made after sale, and before conveyance or assignment,) and with the like consequences, in the several cases aforesaid, as if the application for a sale, or the sale, (as the case may be,) had been in respect of the land so taken in exchange.

45. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the commissioners, upon the application of the owners of the several undivided shares (not subject to be sold under this act, or as to which no proceedings for a sale under this act shall be pending,) of any land in Ireland who shall desire to effect a partition of such land, to make or cause to be made such inquiries as the commissioners may think fit for ascertaining whether such partition would be beneficial to the persons interested in such respective shares; and in case the commissioners shall be of opinion that the proposed partition would be beneficial, and that the terms thereof are just and reasonable, they shall make an order under their seal for such partition accordingly; and in such order, or in a map or plan annexed thereto, shall be shown the part allotted in severalty in respect of each such undivided share; and the part so allotted in severalty in respect of each such undivided share by such order of partition shall, without any conveyance or other assurance in relation thereto, go and enure to and upon the same uses, and be subject to the same conditions, charges, and incumbrances, as the undivided share in respect of which the same is so allotted would have stood limited or been subject to in case such order had not been made.

46. And be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the commissioners, upon the application of the owners of lands in Ireland not subject to be sold under this act, or as to which no proceedings for a sale under this act shall be pending, who shall desire to effect an exchange of such lands, to make or cause to be made such inquiries as the commissioners may think fit for ascertaining whether such exchange would be beneficial to the persons interested in the respective lands; and in case the commissioners shall be of opinion that the proposed exchange would be beneficial, and that the terms thereof are just and reasonable, they shall make an order under their seal for such exchange accordingly; and in such order for exchange, or in a map or plan annexed thereto, shall be shown the lands given and taken in exchange respectively under such order; and the land taken upon such exchange under such order shall, without any conveyance or other assurance in relation thereto, go and enure to and upon the same uses and trusts, and be subject to the same conditions, charges, and incumbrances, as the land given upon such exchange would have stood limited or been subject to in case such order had not been made.

47. And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the commissioners, upon the application of any number of persons who shall be separately owners of parcels of land not subject to be sold under this act, or as to which no proceedings for a sale under this act shall be pending, so intermixed, or divided into parcels of inconvenient form or quantity, that the same cannot be cultivated or occupied to the best advantage, but forming together a tract which may be divided into convenient parcels, and who shall desire to have the whole of such tract divided into convenient parcels, to be allotted in lieu of the old parcels, to make or cause to be made such inquiries as the commissioners may think fit for ascertaining whether such proposed division and allotment would be beneficial to the persons interested in such lands; and in case the commissioners shall be of opinion that the proposed division and allotment would be beneficial, they shall make an order for the division and allotment thereof accordingly, with a map or plan thereunto annexed, in which shall be specified as well the parcels in which the several persons on whose application such order shall have been made were respectively interested before such division and allotment as the several parcels allotted to them respectively by such order; and the parcels of land taken under such division and allotment shall go and enure to and upon the same uses and trusts, and be subject to the same conditions, charges, and incumbrances, as the several lands which the persons taking the same shall have relinquished or lost on such division would have stood limited or been subject to in case such order had not been made.

48. Provided always, and be it enacted, That in the case of land in respect of which no proceedings for a sale under this act shall be pending, no such order of partition or of exchange, or of division and allotment, as aforesaid, shall be made by the commissioners until such notices by advertisement in such public newspaper or newspapers as the commissioners shall direct shall have been given of such proposed partition, exchange, or division and allotment, and three calendar months shall have elapsed from the publication of the last of such advertisements; and in case before the expiration of such three calendar months any person entitled to any estate in or to any charge upon any land included in such proposed partition, exchange, or division and allotment, shall give notice in writing to the Commissioners of his dissent from such proposed partition, exchange, or division, and allotment, (as the case may be,) the Commissioners shall not make an order for such partition, exchange, or division and allotment, unless such dissent shall be withdrawn, or it shall be shown to the Commissioners that the estate or charge of the party so dissenting shall have ceased, or that such estate or charge is not an estate or charge in respect of which he would be entitled in equity to prevent such partition, exchange, or division and allotment; but no such order as aforesaid shall be in anywise liable to be impeached by reason of any infirmity of estate or defect of title of the persons on whose application the same shall have been made.

49. And be it enacted, that every conveyance and assignment respectively executed as required by this act, and every order for partition or for exchange, or for division and allotment, made by the commissioners under their seal, shall for all purposes be conclusive evidence that every application, proceeding, consent, and act whatsoever which ought to have been made, given and done previously to the execution of such conveyance or assignment, or the making of such order respectively, has been made, given, and done by the persons authorized to make, give and do the same; and no such conveyance, assignment, or order shall be impeached by reason of any informality therein.

DUBLIN, JULY 14, 1849.

It has long been an unquestioned principle of our Courts of Equity, that there can be no revivor of a suit for the recovery of costs alone. Kemp v. Mackrell, (2 Ves. 580, S.C. 3 Atk. 811.) This rule, however, applies only to the costs untaxed at the time of the abatement, White v. Hayward, (2 Ves. 461, S.C. 1 Dick. 173,) and not to abatements by death, Sayer v. Sayer, (Dick. 42,) the different judges presiding in the Courts of Equity being astute to discover some means of escape from a rule which Lord Hardwicke had pronounced to be a "hard one." See Barry v. Stowell, (Fl. & Kel. 1, S.C.; 3 L. E. R. 18.)

In the case of Robertson v. Southgate, (13 Jur. 332,) June 9th, 1849, a question of much practical importance has been raised, on the effect of the 3th, 18th, and 19th sections of the 1 & 2 Vic. c. 10, giving decrees of the Court of Chancery the effect of judgments at law. These sections are similar to the 27th and 28th of the analogous Irish Act, the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105. By the decree in that cause, the bill was dismissed, as against all the defendants, with costs; and it was ordered that such costs, when taxed, should be paid by the plaintiffs. Before the costs were taxed, one of the defendants died, and on this fact being brought under the attention of the Taxing Master, he refused to proceed in the taxation of the costs of the deceased defendant. A motion was made beforeigram, V. C., by the executrix of that defendant, without having revived the suit, that the Taxing Master should be ordered to proceed with the taxation of the costs of the deceased defendant. The counsel in support of the motion, admitting that a suit could not be revived for the costs alone, contended that the 1 & 2 Vic. c. 110, made the decree for costs, when registered, a charge upon the plaintiff's lands; that before registration the costs should be ascertained by taxation; that the decree gave a present right, which the taxation subsequently made effectual; and, therefore, in order to carry into effect the spirit of the Act, the Court would assist the creditor by directing taxation, so as to entitle his representative to register the decree. For the other side it was argued, that as the suit was abated, the application could not be entertained, that there could be no revivor for costs, and though the statutes gave decrees the effect of judgments, it could not alter the rules of Equity. The Vice-Chancellor, without giving any opinion upon the effect of the statute, was of opinion the applicant must revive the suit, if she desired to rely on the effect of the statute.

The 27th section of the 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, enacts, that "all decrees and orders of the Court of Chancery, and of the Court of Exchequer, at the Equity side, &c., shall have the effect of judgments." Decrees being thus placed on an equality with judgments, the question arises, what would be the position of a judgment creditor, when one of the parties had died after judgment pronounced, but before final judgment entered.

At the common law, in all actions where there are two or more plaintiffs or demandants, the death of one of them pending the suit—that is, before final judgment, is an abatement of the action. Underhill v. Devereux, 2 Saund. 7 i.) But by the 17 Car. 2, c. 8, s. 1—7 W. 3, c. 7, Ir., if the plaintiff or defendant died after verdict, and before or even after the sittings have commenced, and before the trial, and before final judgment, the action is not abated, but final judgment may be signed, as if the party were alive, and then revived by scire facias, by or against the executor; and by the 9 W. 3, c. 10, Ir., it is enacted, that if any person or persons, being plaintiff or plaintiffs, shall have an interlocutory judgment or judgments, the death of such plaintiff or plaintiffs shall not abate the suit, if the action be such as might originally have been prosecuted by or against the executors, but the judgment may be revived by scire facias.

But for these enactments, it is clear that until after final judgment the party entitled would at common law, have no means of recovering his costs, as judgment was not considered final until the costs were inserted, which could not be done till after taxation, except the costs were waived by the party entitled to them.

In Blackburne v. Rymer, (1 Marsh. 278,) and Butler v. Bulkeley, (1 Bing. 224,) it was held that at law a judgment was not final, till completed by the insertion of the amount of the taxed costs. Pell, Sergeant, arguendo, says, "The only question is, whether judgment is final, on the officer of the Court marking the postea, or on his taxing the costs. The mark on the record seems to be the appropriate and distinguishing indication of the fiat of the Court; but in Blackburne v. Rymer it appears to have been thought that judgment is not final till the Prothonotary's allocatur is completed by the insertion of the amount of the costs." The Court were of this opinion, and made the rule absolute to amend the postea, on payment of costs.

In Pierce v. Derry, (4 Q. B. 635,) where the plaintiff obtained a verdict in July, 1841, entered judgment on the postea on the 13th of December, dating the entry as of that day, and the costs were not taxed till the expiration of two terms after verdict, when the plaintiff entered final judgment, as of the 13th of December, 1841, between which date and the entry of the last judgment the defendant died. Error was brought by the executors. The Court changed the date of the judgment from the 13th of December, 1841, to the 1st of February, 1842, the day of the taxation. Lord C. J. Denman, in his judgment, says—"I should not be disposed, in a case like this, to exercise a discretion which might produce results unjust to one of the parties. But looking to the circumstances and the authorities cited, I think we have no discretion to exercise. We cannot say this was a judgment signed on the 13th of December, 1841, or permit it to stand as such a judgment, and Paterson, J., Butler v. Bulkeley, and other authorities which have been cited, shew that signing judgments is a thing contemporaneous with taxation of costs. If this were not so, what is judgment signed for, unless, indeed, the party signing dispenses with costs."

In Fisher v. Dudding, (3 Man. & Gr. 238, S. C. 9 Dowl. 872,) a question arose as to the time from which the interest on a judgment was to be computed under the provisions of the 1 & 2 Vic. c. 110, s. 17; 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 26, 1r. In that case, final judgment was signed for debt and costs on the 8th of January, 1841; a summons to review the taxation was subsequently had, whereby £12 10s. was added to the original costs, and the question arose as to the effect of the delay on the period from which the interest was to be computed. Tindal, C.J., said this application must be governed by the true construction of the term, "entering up judgment," which occurs in the statute, without reference to any hardship, real or supposed, in this particular case. The time of entering up the judgment appears to me to be the day on which judgment is signed and the incipitur entered in the books kept by the officer of the Court for that purpose. The Court decided, the words "entering up" were to be construed as "signing," and that the original date of the signing was unaltered by the review of taxation.

These authorities and many others referred to in the argument of those cases fix the date at which a judgment at common law became incapable of abatement, to be that of the taxation of costs. That being so our next inquiry should be the time at which a decree is incapable of abatement. The rule at law and in Equity is, when examined, extremely similar. Lord Hardwicke, C. in White v. Hayward, (2 Vern. by Belt, 461,) states the rule to be, "That as to costs the established distinction is that whether given to plaintiff or defendant, by the death of the party before they are taxed, so that they are uncertain and unliquidated, they fall to the ground; because it is a personal demand in the nature of a tort, and dies with the person; but if taxed, they become a certain duty to the representative, who is entitled to some remedy or process of revivor for these costs. This has been determined by Sir Joseph Jekyl and by me in Basset v. Prideaux, March, 1742, where the bill was for costs only, which had been taxed; defendant pleaded that the plaintiff, as administrator, could not revive for costs only, I was of opinion the plaintiff might, and that is the difference." The practice in Equity and at common law, except so far as the latter has been changed by the statutes we have referred to, being that, in either case, until taxation, the costs may be lost by abatement, by death. We have now to consider the effect of the statute (1 & 2 Vic. c. 110, s. 18; 3 & 4 Vic. c. 105, s. 27, 1.) upon the decrees. The 27th section places decrees in no higher position than judgments, and the authorities clearly show that, if it were not for the statutes, before taxation the right to costs would be lost by the death of either plaintiff or defendant, and that the 1 & 2 Vic. c. 110 makes no difference in this respect. Fisher v. Dudding, (3 M. & G. 238.) Unless there be some practice or enactment making an alteration in the law respecting decrees similar to that effected in the law of judgments by the statutes referred to, we do not understand how the 1 & 2 Vic. can have such an effect, unless it could be held to extend those statutes to decrees—a proposition which we think could scarcely be contended for. The 27th section enacts that no decree is to affect real estate till registered. In Bowyer v. Boumish, (1 Jon. & Lat. 228,) the question was raised before Sir E. Sugden, C., who, after deciding that the general rule there can be no revivor for untaxed costs, whether the abatement is caused by the death of the party to pay or the party to receive the costs is immaterial, at p. 242 says, "The law does not alter the case. If the plaintiffs have any right under that statute let them proceed under it. The existence of such a right would be rather an argument against them now. If it does exist it cannot alter the rule of this court."

As the statute cannot change the rule of equity: as at common law, before taxation, the person entitled would lose his costs by the death of either of the parties, and as the statute has no effect in this respect upon judgments. The evident conclusion appears to be, that the rule of equity as to revivor for untaxed costs is unaffected.

THE 25 Geo. 2, c. 13, prescribes the manner in which a distress for rent is to be disposed of. Section 5 enacts "that all distresses lawfully taken for any such rent, shall, unless redeemed "within eight days" after the same shall be distrained for, be sold, &c., the person distraining, his agent, or bailiff, first causing one or more notice or notices in writing, of the place and time intended for such sale, to be posted six days previous to the time of such sale, &c."

The mode in which the time is computed is thus stated in Mr. Longfield's Treatise on Distress, p. 93—"The eight days allowed for redemption are counted inclusive of the day of distress, and the eighth day the notice of sale is posted, and on the fifteenth day the sale takes place. This method of computation has long prevailed, (Dwyer v. Peacock, 2 F. & S. 34), and can only be sanctioned by long custom, as it seems at variance with all legal rules established for the computation of times from acts done. Harper v. Tinsell, (6 C. & P. 186.) If therefore, the distress be made on Monday, the notice of sale must be posted that day week, and that day fortnight is the day for the sale." The doubt expressed by the learned author as to the propriety of this mode of computation, has been fully justified by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in England, in the case Robinson v. Waddington, (13 Jur. 537.) The action was Case for an illegal and excessive distress. The question arose on the statute 2 W. & M. sess. 2, c. 5, s. 2, which enacts that when any goods or chattels shall be distrained for any rent, &c., "and the tenant or owner of the goods so distrained shall not within four days next after such distress taken, and notice thereof," &c., replevy the same, the person distraining may cause the goods, &c., to be appraised and sold, &c. At the trial it appeared that the seizure was made at eight o'clock on Saturday morning, the 25th of September, for a year's rent, and the goods were sold on the afternoon of Thursday the 30th; and it was contended for the plaintiff that the sale was too soon, the tenant having, under the statute, five clear days for replevying his goods and paying the rent, exclusive of the day of seizure and the day of sale. The jury, by the direction of the learned judge, having found for the defendant, a motion for a new trial was made absolute, Lord Denman, C.J. saying "that the court was reluctantly obliged to yield to the later authorities, which produce a revolution in the law upon this point."

The rule laid down in this case is, that where a certain space of time is given to a party to do some act, which space of time is included between two other acts to be done by another person, both the days of doing these acts ought to be excluded, in order to insure to him the whole of that space of time. Applying this rule to the practice in this country, the sale on the fifteenth day is not legal, the words "within eight days" must be construed as the words "within five days" in the English statute, which would bring the sale to the sixteenth day; and if this rule be applicable to the six-day notice, the sale should be upon the seventeenth day; but whether it be so is not, perhaps, without some doubt, as the statute requires the notice to be posted "six days previous to the time of sale," but does not give any act to be done by the tenant within the six days, so that there may be room to contend that the six-day notice should follow the other rule of computation, that where the days are not expressed to be clear, that they shall be held to be exclusive of the first day, and exclusive of the last; and if this be the true construction, a sale upon the sixteenth day would be regular.

The Lords' committee upon the Poor Law, have at length made their final report. The substance of their resolutions is as follows:—

1. That up to 1846, the law of 1838 was efficient, and that even under the altered state of circumstances, many unions have dispensed with the outdoor relief, given by the 10 & 11 Vic. c. 31.

2. That no permanent system for the relief of the poor can be safely carried out in Ireland, without a return to the original law of in-door relief.

3. The building of additional workhouses, and the formation of new unions.

4. That for the erection of new workhouses in distressed districts, money should be advanced, and the Poor-law Commissioners invested with the same power to obtain eligible sites, as the legislature has given for the erection of county gaols, &c.

5. A re-arrangement of electoral divisions, on the principle proposed by the boundary commission.

6. That the earliest period there should be a fair and uniform valuation throughout Ireland, as a basis for rating. That such valuation should not be subject to alteration, without an order from the Poor-law Commissioners.

7. That no greater proportion than one-half of the poor-rates actually paid should, in any case be deducted from the person receiving rent.

8. That to check sub-letting, any person so doing should not have the power of deducting any part of the poor-rate from his rent, but should be solely liable.

9. That in holdings valued at £30 per annum, there should be a power of arrangement between landlord and tenant, that the latter should be liable to the whole rate.

10. That to facilitate the discharge, and prevent the accumulation of arrears of rate, that the guardians do certify half-yearly, to the landlord, the rates three months in arrear, from his tenant. And that if the landlord, within two months after notice, shall pay the whole, or a part of the arrear, that he shall be allowed 10 per cent for collection, and be empowered to recover the tenant's proportion by distress, and by ejectment where the rates of one year are out-standing.

11. That the practice of holding landlords personally responsible for rates owing by out-going and defaulting tenants is unjust, and that the responsibility should be limited to the person originally liable, and to the land on which arrears have accrued.

12. That to encourage the investment of capital, and the employment of labour, farms should not be subject to increased rating, on account of the erection of farm buildings, or of any drainage, or any other permanent agricultural improvement, until seven years after their completion.

13. That to facilitate appeals, the rate-book should be open for inspection during fourteen days before the striking of the rate; that the names of occupiers of £4 value and under, shall be in the book; that in no case the name of the immediate lessor, if discoverable, should be omitted; that the agent should have the like power of appeal as his principal; that the mode of proceeding should be either before the justices of the peace at petty sessions, or before the assistant-barrister, with appeal to the judge of assize.

14. That the names of all recipients of relief should be stated under the names of the townlands in which they are last said to have resided.

15. Enumerates the evils of the quarter acre system, and recommends a clause to enable the landlord to take possession of the land of a person holding more than a quarter of an acre, and receiving relief.

16. That the present duties of the auditors are inefficiently performed, and that the poor law commissioners should particularly direct their attention to this subject.

17. That in the distressed districts, particularly where it is proposed to establish new unions and new workhouses, that after the functions of the paid guardians have ceased, the poor law commissioners, at the request of the guardians, may appoint a paid resident guardian to assist.

18. That having had proof of the expense incurred by the town of Belfast, &c., in the maintenance of paupers transmitted there, the committee bring forward this fact for consideration, as to the means of obviating it.

19 and 20. Recommend emigration.

21. That the committee have heard with great interest evidence detailing the proceedings of the British Association and of the Society of Friends, for the improvement of the condition of the people, by promoting agricultural instruction, a development of the fisheries, and an improvement of the industrial resources of Ireland, thus striking at the root of pauperism. To this the measures recommended by the Government, and adopted by the Legislature, will, it is hoped, largely contribute, extending the means of effecting land improvements, the completion of arterial drainage, and the encouraging of fishery stations and small piers and harbours. The assistance wisely granted to railroads in Ireland has a tendency to promote the natural resources of that country, to give a better reward to industry, and thus to create a more effective demand for labour. The progress of education, the connexion of agricultural instruction, not only with the workhouses, but with certain of the national schools in Ireland, have already met the approval of Parliament. These measures will have a salutary effect in raising the moral and social condition of the people; but much remains to be done to solve that difficult problem, the present state of Ireland. In the solution of that problem, much more than the well-being of Ireland is involved. It is inevitable that the continued depression, ultimate ruin of Ireland cannot take place without the most fatal consequences to Great Britain; loss of a great home market for manufactures; danger to the social state of Great Britain, the permanent misery and degradation of the people of Ireland is so great and so imminent, the committee is confident it will meet the attention it deserves from the public and the Imperial Legislature.

DUBLIN, JULY 21, 1849.

SINCE the new rules of 1832, the question has frequently arisen, whether the money counts, for the purposes of pleading, are to be considered as one or separate. In support of the former view it has been argued that the intention of the new rules was to reduce what was before separate into one, and in support of this opinion Barnes v. Keily (Cr. & Dix, notes, 358), has been cited; whilst the case of Jourdain v. Johnson (2 Cr. M. & R. 564), is relied on as an express authority the other way.

It would appear to us, (although we admit that some observations in the judgment of the court in Barnes v. Keily, have a tendency to the conclusion contended for), that the Irish cases are merely decisions on the effect of the words "last mentioned monies respectively;" and that the money counts, as settled by the rules of 1832, are to be considered as separate and distinct for the purposes of pleading.

There is no principle better established than this, that every count must contain a consideration, a promise, and a breach; but there may, in the same count, be different considerations for the same promise, Webber v. Tivill, (2 Saund. 121, n.e.), provided, however, the sum be not repeated. Morse v. James, (11 M. & W. 881;) McGregor v. Graves, (18 Law Jour. Ex. 109;) but when the sum is repeated, as in the forms settled by the judges in 1832, Jourdain v. Johnson, (2 Cr. M. & R. 564), clearly establishes that the counts are to be distinct and separate; Lord Abinger, page 566, says, "The court think that the last ground of special demurrer must prevail, and that the several demands on the bill of exchange for money paid, lent, and advanced, and interest, and account stated in the declaration in this form are to be considered as different counts. This declaration is framed in compliance with the rules of court, (R. T. W. 4,) in which the demands in indebitatus assumpsit in the form there prescribed are not treated as one but as several counts: they are called money counts, are not one sum as the amount of all the demands, but several sums, and not one consideration and promise, but several are stated, for there is an averment of a promise to pay each sum respectively in consideration of the defendants being indebted in that sum."

The case of Barnes v. Keily, (Cr. & Dix. 358, notes,) is the Irish case which has been relied on as establishing the contrary to the case just cited. The declaration stated that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £50 for the price of goods bargained, sold and delivered, and in £50 for the price of work and materials, and also the money counts in the usual form. The defendant pleaded non assumpsit to the money counts and demurred to the counts for goods bargained, sold and delivered on the ground that the words "the said last-mentioned several monies respectively" at the end of the declaration did not extend to the count for goods bargained and sold. The court overruled the demurrer, and decided not that the money counts were one count, but that the words "last-mentioned" did not confine the promise, but were to be extended to the several causes of action contained in the declaration. Joy, C. B., in his judgment points out the distinction between the case before him and that of Harding v. Hibbel, (Twyr. 315,) cited in support of the demurrer: "In the latter case the declaration was divided into two distinct counts by the words 'and whereas also the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff,' which is not the case here, there are not two counts but one count." It must be recollected, however, that this doctrine of Chief Baron Joy, though worthy of great consideration, was not necessary for the decision of the case, and is opposed, as has before been shown, to the case of Jourdain v. Johnson. Harding v. Hibel, followed in this country by Wilson v. Mitchell, (Long & Townsend, 275,) establishes that when the words "and whereas also the defendant was indebted" are used between two different counts, the effect of the words "last-mentioned" will be to confine the promise to the last count, thereby rendering the previous counts open to demurrer.

From the above observations we draw the following conclusions: 1st. Where the sum is not repeated in the naming of the different considerations for the promise, the pleading is but one entire count. Morse v. James; McGregor v. Graves. 2nd. Where the pleader uses the expression, "and whereas also" in the naming of the different considerations, the words "last-mentioned promises" at the end of the declaration do not refer to the first counts, and, therefore render them liable to demurrer. Harding v. Hibel; Wilson v. Mitchell. 3rd. Where there is a repetition of the sums of money (as in the forms used in this country,) the counts are separate and distinct for the purposes of pleading, Jourdain v. Johnson.

The observations of Chief Baron Joy in Barnes v. Keily have caused that case to be cited in support of the negative of the first proposition; but we think the judgment of Mr. Baron Lefroy in Morrissey v. Walsh, (9 Ir. L. Rep. 296,) is not only conclusive in pointing out what Barnes v. Keily did actually decide, but explains with great clearness the object and effect of the new general rules. The learned Baron, in speaking of the general rules says, (p. 296,) "Their object was not to alter the rules of pleading but to save expense, and in consequence they allow a plaintiff to include separate causes of action, which before would have been matter for several counts in one count; but the words 'promised respectively' distribute the causes of action, and those words are and mean a promise to each of the several causes of action included and contained in that one common count; it is but one count containing several causes of action, and several promises to each, and as to each cause of action a defendant must defend himself by a single defence, he cannot plead and demur to one count containing only one cause of action, whereas if the argument be valid founded on the case of Barnes v. Keily, a defendant might defend himself in two different ways, he might plead and demur to the same count, for that is supposed to have been decided there, because there the declaration was held to contain but one count; but Barnes v. Keily decided no such thing, but decided the contrary to that for which it was cited in that case. The defendant pleaded as to some and demurred as to others of the common counts, and the question was, whether the word 'last-mentioned' tied up the promise to the last count, and the court held that the word 'last-mentioned' did not control and tie up the effects of the word 'promise,' which, by the intention of the general rules, applied to the several causes of action, and the demurrer was overruled because the promise was extended to several of the former as well as the latter, and the due interpretation given to the words 'promised respectively.'"

The rules meant that several causes of action should be put and included in one count, but that the plaintiff should have all the benefit, as if his causes of action were set out in separate counts, and that the promises to all the causes of action might be expressed by the words "promised respectively."

THE report of the Receiver Committee, which we give elsewhere, is drawn up with much ability, and written temperately and distinctly. It has already effected one important good, that it has stayed the Solicitor-general for England from proceeding with his judgment bill in the shape he originally introduced it. He has adopted the suggestion of the Committee, which were principally derived from the evidence of Sir Edward Sugden. As it originally stood the power of appointing a receiver prospectively was abolished, it is now proposed to be given in cases where the debt exceeds £150. The whole character of the bill is altered. We judge from the readiness to change his own views on this and other occasions exhibited by the English Solicitor General that he is of a very plastic disposition. He has not much knowledge of the subject or of the peculiarities of Irish law and practice, and takes up too readily any statements that may have been made to him. Take, for example, the following sentences: "Judgments sometimes stood over for fifty or sixty years, and they were frequently regarded as if they constituted the estate itself. The result was that a man wanting to sell an estate had to make out a title to all the incumbrances, and it therefore became necessary to induce all parties concerned to concur in the conveyance of the land; hence not one deed, but frequently five or six deeds became necessary, and sometimes five or six sets of deeds were required, and the expenses thus occasioned were much increased by the operation of particular acts of Parliament. There were even cases in which judgment creditors had bad judgments against themselves, and so there was judgment upon judgment, each a charge upon the land, and therefore it was almost impossible to make out a good title."

The reporters of the London papers—(we have quoted from the Times)—are wonderfully quick, as a general rule, in catching the Speaker's meaning; but it is possible, not being familiar with legal questions, they may have mistaken that of the Solicitor General; we incline, however, to think not. If our memory be accurate, he had been corrected—during the progress through the House of the Incumbered Estates Bill of last session—by Mr. Sadlier in some of the mistakes he has again fallen into. If the money be forthcoming, and it be desired to extinguish the judgment, the process is very simple, by entering satisfaction on the Roll, and no deed is required. We also take leave to inform the Solicitor General, that a judgment is not a charge upon a judgment, and that there are no words of any act of parliament that make it so; and that the contrary has been decided in this country.

We have great respect for the abilities, for the learning, for the distinguished name of the Solicitor General; but we deprecate again, as we have done before, the allowance of Irish law measures to be entrusted to English lawyers; and we blame the Irish Executive for having no Irish law officer of the crown, a member of the Imperial Legislature.

It is fortunate that the Irish bar does not want a fitting representative in the person of Mr. Napier. His report in point of style, arrangement and matter do him great credit. In the suggestions which the Committee have made so far as they go, we concur; hereafter we shall state those points which, in our judgment, make us regret that they do not go far enough.

REPORT FROM THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON RECEIVERS, COURTS OF CHANCERY AND EXCHEQUER, (IRELAND.)

The Select Committee appointed to inquire into the state of the law as respects the appointment of receivers of the Court of Chancery and Equity Exchequer in Ireland, and the effect of the present laws and regulations of the said Courts in the management of estates under their control, have considered the matter referred to them, and have agreed upon the following Report:—

Your Committee have prosecuted the inquiry entrusted to them, by a careful examination of several witnesses, whose evidence is entitled to great consideration. The late Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Sir Edward Sugden; the present Master of the Rolls, one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery, the Second Remembrancer of the Court of Exchequer, together with a member of the Irish Bar,* and an Irish Solicitor,† have severally been examined. Their evidence appeared to your Committee to be so full and comprehensive, that it would be unprofitable, at this late period of the session, to prolong the investigation; nor could your Committee expect to obtain any additional information from witnesses of higher authority.

It may be collected from the evidence, that nearly one tenth of the rental of Ireland is under the management of the Courts of Equity, and that there has been a gradual increase of late, by reason of the general distress which has prevailed, the want of purchasers where properties, the subject of suits, have been offered for sale, and the facility of obtaining receivers, at the instance of judgment creditors, of which advantage has been largely taken, especially where the sums due on judgments have been of small amount.

The prominent evils of the present system of management under receivers appointed at the instance of creditors, are so generally admitted, that the witnesses are unanimous in its condemnation. As to the extent to which it might, and the manner in which it ought to be corrected, a difference of opinion, as might be anticipated, will be found to exist.

Some of these evils are inherent in the system, whilst others are the result of abuses, much aggravated by the peculiar circumstances of Ireland and the general habits of the people.

In order to apprehend clearly the effect of court management, in its influence on the condition of the estates, a classification of such as are under the courts may conveniently be adopted.

The estates of lunatics and minors form the first class; the second includes other estates subject to incumbrances, whether by mortgage or judgment.

There is a subdivision of this latter class, which it is also proper to notice:—

First, where the incumbrance and the property are of considerable amount.

Second, where either is inconsiderable.

In the case of estates of lunatics and minors, the Court of Chancery has a protective authority over the property, as exercising the parental functions of the Sovereign; but where the ordinary power of a proprietor is suspended, in consequence of a transfer of the estate to the control of the Court, by a creditor in the prosecution of his rights, the jurisdiction arises from the duty of the Court to protect and effectuate these rights when duly ascertained.

A remarkable difference in the management and condition of these two classes of estates, is on all hands acknowledged; and a further difference exists between the two subordinate classes into which the second general class is subdivided. It seems to your Committee important to investigate the source of these differences, in order to discover remedies which may mitigate, (if not abate,) the serious and increasing evils of a system which occasions private mischief and public inconvenience.

In the first general class the Court has a plenary jurisdiction, for the protection and beneficial management of the property. It is frequently aided in the execution of its functions by some relative of the lunatic or minor, in conjunction with the family agent, and thus are in some degree preserved those private and kindly influences which are calculated to operate powerfully on the general condition of a tenantry.

But when a creditor originates legal proceedings, and transfers the estate of his debtor to the dominion of a Court of Equity, the relation of landlord and tenant is virtually severed; pressure of claims, hostile litigation, evasion of liability, and confusion of rights generally follow; and the effect thus produced cannot but be prejudicial to the condition of the estate and the interests of all parties concerned in its prosperity.

The temporary control of the court, which is given for the purpose of effectuating the rights of the creditor, cannot, in its very nature, be exercised, without regard to the object for which it is conferred; and although it is suggested in the evidence of some who have been examined, that the creditor's strict rights are subordinate to the public good, and that a system of liberal management might be allowed, at the risk to some extent of the postponement or abridgment of the creditor's demand, it is urged by other witnesses, for reasons more difficult to refute, that a jurisdiction called forth by the necessity of enforcing a right, cannot consistently displace, or postpone as subordinate, that which in the very nature of the proceeding is primary and paramount. The inherent jurisdiction of the Court is different in the two classes—and even if made co-extensive, it must still be exercised in a manner peculiar to each class, and thus it could not be equalized in its effects on both.

* A. Hickey, Esq.

It would, therefore, appear generally desirable, that in any case in which an estate is brought under the court at the instance of a creditor, the proceedings should be accelerated with all reasonable dispatch, and the estate withdrawn as speedily as may be consistent with substantial justice, from a jurisdiction which suspends the performance of some of the most useful duties of property, while its rights are prejudicially and expensively asserted. To this important topic it will be necessary to recur, for it seems to the committee, vitally connected with the subject of the present inquiry.

It may be convenient now to notice the peculiarities of the two classes of estates placed under the courts at the instance of creditors. It may be assumed that so far as the authority of the court is insufficient, the defect may be corrected, though not to the extent of securing such a course of management as might be exercised over the property of a lunatic or minor. The useful administration of any power which the court may either have or acquire, must mainly depend on the class of persons appointed to the office of receiver, and this is a part of the subject which, more than any other, requires a searching inquiry.

Where the estate is large, a receiver may be obtained who can manage it beneficially; where the demand of the creditor, or the property of the debtor is small, not merely is it difficult to select a receiver of independence or capability, but it would seem to be at variance with the real design for which this remedy in such cases is usually adopted. The mischievous facility, afforded by the existing law, for appointing a receiver at the suit of every judgment creditor, and over almost every species of property, and the security for the costs of the appointment, without reference to the satisfaction of the debt, have perverted what was intended to be a cheap and convenient remedy for a right, into a vexatious instrument for accumulating law costs, unproductive to the creditor, injurious to the debtor, and prejudicial to the public. Under the difficulties and pressure of the times, a large and increasing staff of receivers of this inferior class, appear to be in continual course of appointment by the courts; for it is obligatory, not optional, to appoint a receiver when a petition is presented. In one case noticed in the evidence, a petition was presented for the appointment of a receiver where the debt was £5; another, where the annual value of the property was £10; the court had no authority to refuse the appointment in either case. It appears to your committee a matter of public policy, that the power of obtaining receivers for small demands, or over a small property, should not be suffered to continue; the witnesses are nearly unanimous in the propriety of excluding all cases under £100; whilst some of great authority intimate that a higher amount might be fixed as the minimum of debt for which this remedy should be allowed. They also concur in the opinion that the costs of the appointment should not be separated from the creditor's demand, but paid (if at all) with the debt itself. In this last suggestion your committee entirely concur.

The operation of the law which allows one species of judgment to be assigned in such a manner as to give a legal title to the assignee, connects itself with the subject of the abuse of remedies against the debtor's estate. The general lien of a judgment hovering over all the property of a debtor, produces manifest inconvenience, especially when the judgment is likely to remain unsatisfied. The assignability of certain judgments in Ireland, has rendered them a current and continuing security; they are usually designated as "the common assurance of the country." The extension of the remedy by allowing a receiver to be obtained in every case, under the act commonly known as O'Loughlen's act, and the extension of the lien as a legal incumbrance and equitable charge under the act called Pigot's act, have so augmented the general inconvenience of judgments in their operation, as to make their multiplication a great and growing evil, acting on habits of improvidence, and clogging the transfer of property. A difference of opinion, however, exists as to the policy of any immediate alteration in this law of assignment, Sir Edward Sugden pronouncing that it ought not to be touched at present, inasmuch as it might excite apprehension in the minds of those who have been accustomed to regard an assignable judgment as a current security in Ireland, and that it is impolitic and unwise to force upon a people any sudden change in their laws, against what may reasonably be supposed to be the general feeling of the country. He suggests that by the withdrawal of the power of obtaining a receiver for small demands, and giving a year of grace to a debtor after a judgment is recovered or confessed, before the creditor should be empowered to obtain a receiver over the property, together with some other alterations, mild in their character, and beneficial in their tendency, a gradual change might be introduced, which would not merely accompany, but encourage improved habits and feelings, and render it unnecessary to alter a law which, in the abstract, he considers to be founded on a sound principle, though open to easy abuse by improvident or embarrassed men.

Your committee cannot but be impressed with the force and authority of this opinion. On the other hand, the Master of the Rolls is favourable to a policy which might render judgments as unpopular security in Ireland. He thinks that the genuine use of a judgment is perverted under the provisions of the existing law, and that men are tempted to be improvident by the facility of giving a cheap security, which, even when stripped of the inconvenience of recent remedies, obstructs fair dealing with property.

Your committee have much difficulty in coming to a conclusion on this important question, but they incline to the opinion that judgments hereafter acknowledged should not be assignable at law.

It occurs to your committee that the public mind is prepared for a prudent change in the course of dealing with property in Ireland, and that there is a growing disposition to discourage a system of incumbrance, which has occasioned such acknowledged inconvenience; and that on the whole it is a sound policy in reforming a law which must act on the new arrangement of a large extent of property, to recast its provisions rather with a view to secure what is generally desired in reference to the future, than endeavour to satisfy feelings connected with habits of the past, which ought never to have been encouraged.

It may now be convenient to consider the case in which the appointment of a receiver at the instance of a creditor is unavoidable; and in which an amendment of the system may be attempted with some prospect of success. With regard to the condition in which the receiver often finds the property when he enters upon his office, the evil may best be remedied by the effect which an improved system of management may have, in rendering debtors less disposed to deal recklessly with their property when proceedings are instituted against them. Under the present system, it seems to be generally assumed that the appointment of the receiver seals the fate of the debtor and his property; accordingly the resources of litigation are frequently exhausted in delaying the appointment, and the interval is employed in obtaining by collusion and contrivance from the tenants of the estate all rent due and accruing. The receiver is tempted to collect as soon and account as late as possible, using the money in the interval for his private profit; and a tenantry ready to resist, unable to pay demands collusively arranged, and pre-disposed to baffle and evade the efforts of the receiver seeking to compel the discharge of their subsequent liabilities, cut themselves off from all opportunity of improving their condition; the difficult position of the receiver occasions a frequent application to the court, thereby multiplying costs for the benefit of the professional auxiliaries; and thus the rental of the estate is wasted by a course of improvidence and litigation.

These are evils connected with the system which are the casual results of its general imperfection. The matters to which a remedy may be usefully applied, may conveniently be reduced to the two heads already noticed—

First—The want of jurisdiction in the court to exercise authority as an owner, under occasional exigencies; this defect must be remedied (if at all) by legislation.

Second—The established course of the court, and practice of receivers, for the correction of which legislation is most desirable, though to some extent not absolutely essential.

In reference to the first it is proper to observe, that although it would be advisable to confer on the court the same power as it possesses over the estates of lunatics and minors, it would not be ordinarily exercised to the same extent, for reasons already explained. There are, however, instances in which the absence of such a power produces a failure of justice. A moderate outlay for urgent repairs, an abatement of rent, solicited under circumstances which justify the request as reasonable, and other occasional allowances of an ordinary character, ought to be within the jurisdiction of the court to sanction of its own authority, and according to a responsible discretion. It appears from the evidence of Sir Edward Sugden, that the aid of the legislature is needed for this purpose; for cases have occurred before him, when presiding in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, in which he would have considered it his duty to have exercised the power of ordering such allowances, if he had possessed sufficient jurisdiction.

In reference to the letting of land under the court, it is limited by the pendency of the suit, and the course is to make a lease for seven years, pendente lite. Such a tenure is most objectionable, not merely from the shortness of the full period of the demise, but from the liability of the tenancy to be suddenly determined; in both respects it is calculated to discourage improvement, and prevent a solvent tenant from cultivating the land in a husbandlike manner with a fair prospect of advantage. The course of the court as to the letting even for this limited term must be noticed hereafter; but as it is the policy of the legislature to encourage the granting of beneficial leases in Ireland, and under a recent act the stamp duty on a lease made in pursuance of its provisions for any term not less than 14 nor exceeding 31 years, has been reduced to 1s., it would seem proper to invest the court with power to grant such a lease for an absolute term of 14 years at least, to be used wherever the court could grant it with a reasonable assurance of the solvency of the tenant. In truth your committee consider it of importance that the court should possess, so long as it has the interim control over property, the authority of an owner; but to be exercised with a cautious discretion, and so as not to occasion any undue delay in the proceedings at the suit of the incumbrancer, or unreasonably interfere with his remedy against the estate itself.

So far, therefore, as the nature of the jurisdiction does not occasion a difference in the exercise of the power of the court, the estate would not, under the proposed alteration of the law, be subject to an authority inferior to that possessed over the estates of lunatics or minors.

The next matter of great practical importance, and perhaps most to be considered, as pregnant with the greatest amount of evil, is the ordinary course of proceedings taken in the appointment of the receiver, and afterwards by the receiver over the estate.

The tendency of the evidence taken by your committee shows it to be desirable that the receiver should be resident on or near to the property, acquainted with agriculture, of independent character and personal influence. But the general practice of the court, as explained by the Master of the Rolls, in effect admits the plaintiff's solicitor to appoint the receiver. This is a fruitful source of mismanagement, from the ordinary unfitness of the person appointed to discharge the duties of a useful agent; and it inflicts much unnecessary and unjust expense on the exhausted property, by multiplying applications, on what are called statements of facts, which legalize a claim for costs, to be paid out of the estate, without any corresponding advantage.

Where the Master of the Rolls has had the opportunity of making a special order, that in appointing a receiver regard should be had to qualification, without reference to the nomination of the solicitor of the party having the carriage of the order, it appears by his evidence that the court has succeeded in obtaining a competent and useful receiver. The security required is frequently very large, amounting to two year's rental, so that when the appointment is about to be made a candidate procured by the plaintiff's solicitor is ready with his security, and competition is virtually excluded. It would appear that by an alteration in the time and manner of accounting, the necessity for so large a security, and in the form of a recognizance, might be avoided and this of itself would be a step in favour of competition. Forms and amount of security less difficult to complete, and equally satisfactory, might be sanctioned with advantage.

Your committee agree in the opinion that it is against public policy to allow any member of the legal profession to act as a receiver, unless by special order of the court, made on notice to all the parties in the cause or matter pending, where the court may, under peculiar circumstances, consider the appointment entitled to its sanction. By a return of the receivers under the courts of equity in Ireland, which has been made to the house and referred to your committee, it appears that in many instances receivers have been appointed and are now acting in contravention of the rules of the courts. It would seem to be of importance to have every one removed who has been so appointed, and so continues to act; the costs of obtaining such removal to be paid by the receiver and any solicitor or party in the cause or matter who has procured the appointment. It would also be advisable to have the accounts of receivers inspected and balanced with convenient dispatch up to some fixed period. In the present state of the country, and the difficulties which press on proprietors, the most vigorous and efficient steps should be taken promptly to relieve property from the abuses of a system so ruinous to private rights and discreditable to the administration of justice.

Your committee would recommend that the courts of equity should be aided by whatever legislation is proper to enable them to arrange and execute such a code of rules as would be likely to encourage, if not secure the selection of a competent person as receiver, wherever the appointment must be made. These rules might further provide for the lodgment of monies from time to time, when received, as required in the case of county treasurers, under the act of 1 Vic. c. 54; the balancing of the accounts at convenient intervals; periodical reports of the condition of the estate; and occasional inspection and report by some competent and responsible person under the direction of the court, and unconnected with any interested party. It also appears to your committee that the mode of letting lands under the court ought at once to be discontinued. The extravagant expense of a lease and its accompaniments, as detailed by Master Brooke in his evidence, is unnecessary for any purpose of policy or justice. Although not perhaps necessary to any considerable extent to direct attention to extracts from the evidence where the witnesses are so few and competent, and their testimony so relevant and clear, it may not be without advantage to set forth in this part of the report the description of the mode of letting land to a tenant under the court.
